SAMPLE

The Homeland Defender

The Personality That Fights for the Ground Itself

Aiman Sterling

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Buy the full book:

Carousell

Contents

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Homeland Defender at a Glance

Chapter 2: The Core — the Engine of the Ground

Chapter 3: The Instrument — the Held Ground, Taken Apart

Chapter 4: The Craft — the Land Known, Worked, and Never Abandoned

Chapter 5: The Honest Costs

Chapter 6: The Dark Side — Roots Become Walls

Chapter 8: The Homeland Defender in Love and Friendship

Chapter 9: The Matchups — Companions, Rivals, and the Other Types

Afterword

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

You know this person, or you are this person. The one who still lives in the family house and knows which beam cracks in January and where the water stands after a hard rain; the one who was the last to leave the street and can still name every family that ever lived in every door; the one who turned down the transfer to the capital without a flicker — my people are buried here — and has never once, in forty years, explained it further, because to the Defender the sentence is complete and needs no defense.

This is a case file on the Homeland Defender: the personality that fights for the ground itself.

The founding scene is a home threatened — soil, street, or country — and the discovery, made young, that this type would be the last one standing on it. The engine: belonging measured in ground; the defense of place as the defense of self. The child watched everything reasonable and mobile pack and go, and made a decision the way all children on this shelf make theirs — silently, intelligently, for keeps: I will hold the ground. And the ground held. The family was never dissolved, the street never fully emptied, the language never died at the kitchen table — because one child decided to be the floor it all stood on.

the village chronicle follows the standard course, and it will honor what deserves honoring: the staying was genius. It was the right answer, made by a child, in the only laboratory that matters — a home under threat — and this book will never call the keeping a defect. The Defender is the reason some families still have a place to return to; the reason some recipes survive; the reason the old house is still standing, mortgaged and patched and holding. And the village chronicle will audit what the keeping quietly costs, decades after the threat has moved on: the world's good things increasingly located elsewhere; the promotions that required leaving, declined without regret and recorded without mercy; the street thinning around the one who stayed; and the shadow the village chronicle will handle with care — the ground slowly placed over the people, the roots slowly hardening into walls, the stranger read as invader, the new read as threat, the defense of the home becoming the thing the home must be defended against.

And the growth: home carried within — the place loved without the gate, the ground defended by what it grows.

If you are this type, the warrior code's wager is precise: the ground was never actually holding you; you were holding it — and the self, it turns out, is portable, and the place, it turns out, is alive, and living things change or die. If you love one, your instruction is patient: do not ask them to leave. Ask them to open — the gate, the door, the ledger — because the Defender's love is real and total and it is expressed entirely in keeping, and the kept thing, whatever it is, will outlast them only if they let it live.

Turn the page. The wall is magnificent, and it saved a home; this book is about the door that gets cut into it, and the orchard that grows on the other side.

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Homeland Defender at a Glance

The tell, before a word is spoken, is where the person stands — and the village chronicle's first finding is that the Defender is always positioned with respect to the ground: at the party, they are not in the middle of the room but at its edge, in sight of the door, angled so the whole room is in view — the stance of a person who is hosting even in someone else's house. They arrive early; they know the building's history before they know the host's surname; within ten minutes they have straightened the garden gate that was dragging, noticed the damp in the far corner, and asked a question about the property line that no one else at the party has ever thought to ask.

Their conversation has a fixed gravity: everything comes back to place — the neighborhood that used to be, the family that used to live there, the orchard that was cut down for the parking lot, told with a grief that is quiet, specific, and older than the evening. And the little tell that separates the genuine article from the merely nostalgic: the Defender is not remembering the place — they are on duty in it. The nostalgia is someone else's word for their watch.

The second tell is the accent that refuses to thin. Most people's speech flattens as the world homogenizes them; the Defender's thickens when they cross their own ground, at the market where their grandmother argued in the old language, at the table on the holiday, on the phone with the sibling who left. It is not an inability to adapt — the file is emphatic on this point, because the Defender can pass anywhere for an hour and chooses not to: the accent is maintained, the way a wall is maintained, because to the Defender the voice is territory. The recipes are the same: not kept as curios but cooked, on schedule, with the correct complaints about how everyone else makes them wrong. The language survives at the kitchen table because someone decided it would, and the someone is standing in front of you, pronouncing the family dish with the stress on the correct syllable and watching to see if you notice.

The third tell is the one the room almost misses: the Defender never asks to be somewhere else. Under observation the manner sharpens precisely here — give the room a plan, a trip, a relocation, a fresh start, and watch the Defender's response arrive a beat too quickly, too even, too final: It's a long way to go for that. No envy, no deliberation, no visible temptation. The rest of the room weighs the invitation; the Defender has already declined it in the time it took the sentence to land, and the village chronicle's margin note, held for the rest of the warrior code: a person this certain about staying was made certain by something, and the certainty was installed long before the party, in a house the guests have never seen, on a day the Defender does not discuss.

The signature in the past is the home under threat — and the first stand, assembled across a hundred incursion village chronicles, arrives in two versions that converge on the same origin moment. The first version is the threatened ground: the auction notice on the family land; the demolition order; the flood that took the ground floor and the winter that took the roof; the street beginning to empty as the neighbors, one by one, took the town's advice and the city's offers and went. The second version is the lost country: the exodus family — the border crossed, the language halved, the arrival in a place that did not want them — and the child growing up in a kitchen where the old country survived only because two people refused to let it die at the table.

Different geographies, the file notes, the same architecture: a home that could only be kept by keeping it, in a world that had started removing the family from the place or the place from the family.

And the origin moment, in both versions, is the child's discovery of who leaves. The adults discussed the offer, the move, the mercy of starting over somewhere easier; the reasonable people packed. And the child — eight, ten, twelve — stood in the middle of the argument or the silence and made the discovery that would run the next fifty years: everyone reasonable goes; somebody has to be the one who stays. The convergence point is always the same sentence, thought in a child's grammar and never once revised: if I hold the ground, we are still us. The house cannot be dissolved while one of us stands in it.

The family cannot scatter past rescue while one door still opens on the old street. The language cannot die while one kitchen still speaks it. The quiet contract, signed in the child's own hand without a witness: I will not leave. I will keep what they kept. I will be the last one standing — and the ground, held, will hold us.

Open the album and the photos are placed: the child on the steps of the old house, always the same steps; the child beside the grandfather at the grafting bench, learning which cut the pear tree forgives; the family at the station in the leaving photo — the version-two families always have one — every face turned toward the new life, and one small face turned back. The recurring figure is the small custodian: the child with the key on the string around its neck, given early and never once lost; the child who knew at ten which wall was load-bearing and which neighbor to call when the pipes froze; the child keeping the ledger of the land — who used to live there, where the well was, when the big tree came down — an archive collected with a seriousness the adults found funny and the file finds central.

The album's most telling photo is the one nobody chooses: the child alone on the porch of the emptied house, or at the gate of the cleared lot, standing where the family stood, the only one there, in the picture taken after everyone else had gone — the first stand, in fact, photographed by accident and filed away, because it looked like nothing was happening. And the closer, written plainly because it is the whole type in one frame: the child at the market, counting the change for the grandmother, correcting the vendor's pronunciation of the village name — the child already the adult, the watch already kept, twenty years before the watch was needed.

Energy: Steady, load-bearing, and boundary-shaped — the wattage does not scatter across the horizon; it concentrates at the perimeter, where the Defender stands; the energy of a system built for endurance in one place, deployed against one threat, for one family, indefinitely.

Ambition: Preservation-shaped, not ascent-shaped — the Defender does not climb; the Defender keeps: the land intact, the house standing, the table full, the recipes exact, the name remembered; and the file's quiet finding: the ambition is as total as any careerist's, aimed at continuity instead of altitude — a whole life spent winning victories that look, from outside, like nothing happened.

Vanity structure: The unbroken tenure — the deep, quiet, absolute pride of I am still here: last on the street, first at the cemetery, the one they couldn't move; and beneath it the first stand's arithmetic, I am the ground — which is also the prison, because a self that is a place can never leave itself, and the vanity and the immobility are the same stone.

Loyalty: Total, generational, and measured in ground — to the place first and to the people through the place; the Defender will drive three hours to tend a grave and be home by dark, and the file's honest finding: the loyalty is real, ancient, and beautiful, and it has a blind spot exactly its own shape — the loyalty extends to those who stay and strains, visibly, toward those who left, not because the love failed but because leaving was the one thing the contract forbade.

Weakness: The gate — the Defender cannot leave and, worse, cannot forgive leaving: the sibling who moved abroad exists at a discount; the friend who relocated is mourned slightly in advance; and the blindness riding with it: the Defender has no idea that the world reads the gate as coldness rather than devotion, and has quietly lost people the Defender never meant to wound — not by keeping them out, but by keeping the place between them.

Unspoken need: To know the staying mattered — that the ground remembers who kept it; to hear, once, from the family that scattered anyway, the sentence the founding was written to earn: because you stayed, we still have a home. And beneath that, the need the engine makes unspeakable: to find out whether there is a self at all if the ground is taken — whether home is something they are or something they carry, and the answer, the file will argue, is the whole growth chapter.

At a party: the host in someone else's house — early, positioned, useful; the gate straightened, the damp noticed, the property line asked about; the accent thickening as the evening warms; the room's quiet dependence on the one person who knows why the street is named what it is — and the file's margin note: watch the Defender decline the weekend invitation to the lake, twice, gently, and go home having been, somehow, the most present person there.

In a new job: the magnificent hire within range — the tenured spine, the memory, the standards, the institution kept running by a person who knows where every pipe and precedent runs; and the file's honest entry: the offer that requires the move will be declined with such speed and such grace that the employer mistakes it for modesty — the salary bump declined, the relocation declined, the promotion politely declined — and the employer's loss is the town's gain, and the Defender's ceiling, drawn once, in a child's hand, never renegotiated.

Under sudden pressure: magnificent — the founding's whole training, deployed at last: the flood, the fire, the notice pinned to the fence, the crisis of place — and the Defender goes flat and total: sandbags passed, neighbors organized, the boundary held, the family moved to safety in four minutes and the Defender still on the ground; the file's finding: in the threat to the place, this is the most valuable person in any district, and the world's gratitude is total, and the cost, as always, is invisible: the crisis is the one weather the Defender was built for, and the calm everyone praises is a child standing where the adults left, still holding the line.

In a boring meeting: the custodian of memory — the one who knows why the wall was built, which clause of which agreement still binds, whose name was on the deed before the merger; the newcomer's quick, private verdict: they are against everything new — and the meeting's slower discovery, available to whoever stays long enough: the Defender is not against the new; the Defender is for the record, and half the new plans fail exactly the way the Defender said they would, in the year the Defender said they would, and the meeting, eventually, learns to ask first.

On holiday: the guest who is glad to be nowhere else for exactly eleven days — the itinerary negotiated down to the coastline, the language practiced in advance, the market found on the first morning; and the tell, uniform across the case files, on the return: the Defender steps off the train, or the ferry, or the plane, onto the home ground, and the shoulders drop half an inch and the accent comes home to the correct syllables, and the sentence said to no one: good. The world thinks the Defender hates travel. The file corrects it: the Defender travels like a swimmer — out, and back, and the back is the point.

Not the Steadfast Guardian, the personality that holds everyone up — the confusion is instant, because both are protectors, both are reliable past the point of reason, and both will be found, in any crisis, standing exactly where the trouble is. The hinge is what is being held. The Guardian's loyalty is aimed at people and travels with them — move the family to the city, and the Guardian goes, and the holding continues on new ground; the Defender's loyalty is aimed at ground and holds whoever stands on it — move the family to the city, and the Defender stays, holding the ground with a portion of the heart, and the people with the rest.

The quick test, one scene each: give both a family that must relocate for a child's sake. The Guardian packs the house — grief for the place, but the people are the cargo. The Defender cannot — not will not, cannot — and the tragedy is that the grief is the same size and aimed in opposite directions; the file's line on the pair: one is a wall around a family; the other is a family, standing in a wall.

Not the Fallen Sovereign, the personality that refuses to abdicate a crown already lost — the confusion is subtler and more instructive, because both fight on past the point where reasonable people concede, and both are loyal to something the world has written off. The hinge is whether the object survives. The Sovereign fights for a status that is gone — the crown dissolved, the title emptied, the cause lost at the treaty table — and the fight curdles because its object exists only in the Sovereign; the Defender fights for a ground that is still there — standing, tangible, deedable, defensible — and the fight stays real because its object keeps answering back.

But the file enters the pairing as a warning, because the Sovereign is the Defender's possible future: let the ground be taken anyway — the demolition come, the family gone, the street rebuilt past recognition — and watch a Defender with no carried home turn, in a season, into a Sovereign: defending a memory with a garrison's grammar, the last loyalist of a country that no longer exists. The sharp test: ask each what victory looks like. The Sovereign answers first: restoration. The Defender answers slowly, and honestly, and the answer is the whole difference: a quiet street.

And the signature village chronicle closes with the refined field check the levy has waited the whole this tribe to deploy, because the rootedness reads as loyalty at first contact and as the wall by the third act, and the space between has never been measured — and the refined check is run not at the defending but at the newcomer: watch what happens when the gate must open for someone the ground doesn't know. the outrider's log of a recorded incursion: the war chief at forty, the ground certified at three decades — the person who does not leave, the accent defended, the soil worked, all real — and the instrument is the ordinary arrival, deliberately recounted: the new neighbor, the young couple, the moving truck at the old farmhouse next door — and the levy's readings, taken across the first month: the war chief, watching — the war account should mark the tell with its driest care: the wave, given — the war chief's own, from the fence line, genuine — and beneath it, the old frequency running audibly: the first stand's own arithmetic, the stranger registering as threat to the ground — and the outrider's key smoke column, the one the stockade has waited the whole archipelago to log: the welcome and the audit run concurrently. the war account should mark it plainly: the couple, warded honestly, were greeted — and then read for a month like a field's drainage: the truck's stickers, noted; the fence line, walked; the welcome, warm, and the ledger, opened — and the neighbors' exit interviews, the levy's collected set, converge on the sentence the village chronicle has waited a generation to log: "the warmest man on this road, and the war account should log the difference: he'll plow your driveway before you own a shovel — and it took him three years to say your first name without the pause, because the pause, the whole signal fire, was the gate, checking the ground still mattered to you."

And the check's one measurement, aimed past the loyalty at the cost underneath: count the people the gate has passed through. the levy ran it across the raids: neighbors helped, in the recounted year — every one, certified, the plow, the seedlings, the held ladder; neighbors let in — the kitchen door, the coffee, the first name without the pause — zero, and the war account should log the signal fire with everything it has: the war chief, at the check's deepest probe, was called out the rules of war's battle- hardened question — 'when does the stranger stop being a stranger?' — and the answer, after the most extended pause in this volume's interviews, delivered with the old fence-line calm, verbatim: "when the ground would miss them.

I've never waited long enough to find out what that costs." And the field check's one-line finding: the Homeland Defender is the only constitution in this tribe whose belonging is measured in ground — the wall, the whole false alarm, was built to save a home that was actually threatened once, and the gate, warded honestly, now audits everyone the home was never threatened by — and the arithmetic, warded honestly, is the war drum in miniature: the child learned that the home survives only if someone stands on the soil; the adult stands, forever, auditing arrivals — and the home, the war account certifies, has been safe for thirty years — and the wall, the whole signal fire, is now defending the orchard from the pollinators.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io

Read the rest

THE HOMELAND DEFENDER

The full book continues past this sample.

Get it here:
https://ko-fi.com/s/913ce16e6c

Pay what you want, S$1.90 or more. No account needed. Instant PDF + EPUB.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Aiman Sterling is the author of The Archetype Series -- a library of personality portraits drawn the way literature draws characters: the great types of human temperament, recognized at a glance, understood in depth, and followed from childhood wound to mature strength.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Aiman Sterling is the author of The Archetype Series -- a library of personality portraits drawn the way literature draws characters: the great types of human temperament, recognized at a glance, understood in depth, and followed from childhood wound to mature strength.