SAMPLE

Qawm Lut: The People of the Rain

The Story of the People of Lut (لُوط)in the Quran

Aira Aurora

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Introduction

The Quran tells the stories of nations — peoples who received prophets, rejected or accepted the message, and were destroyed or saved. The first book in this series covered Qawm Nuh — the first destroyed nation. The second covered Aad — the people of the wind. The third covered Thamud — the people of the rock. This book covers the fourth: Qawm Lut, the people of the rain.

Qawm Lut were the people of Sodom — a city in the valley of the Jordan River, in the land that is now associated with the Dead Sea. They were a people of prosperity and corruption: the Quran describes them as the first to commit a sin that no people before them had committed (7:80). They were a people of agriculture, of trade, of wealth — and they used their wealth and their position to practice what no nation had practiced before. Their sin was not merely a moral failing; it was an innovation in evil — the first commission of an act that the Quran treats as a defining marker of their nation.

Allah sent Lut to them — the nephew of Ibrahim, a prophet in his own right, calling his people to righteousness and away from their corruption. Lut's message was not only the call to tawhid but the call to purity — the call to abandon the specific sin that defined his people. His preaching was patient, his warnings were clear, and his grief was real. But Qawm Lut did not listen. They mocked him, rejected him, and even tried to expel him from their city.

The destruction of Qawm Lut came by rain — not the rain of water that gives life, but the rain of stones that destroys. The Quran says: "So We rained upon them a rain of stones, and evil was the rain of those who were warned" (26:173, 27:58). The cities were turned upside down (11:82) — the earth itself was flipped — and the rain of baked clay (51:33-34) fell upon the people who had innovated in evil. The destruction came at dawn (15:73, 54:38) — the moment when the night ends and the day begins, the moment when the people of Sodom were preparing for another day of corruption.

The story of Qawm Lut appears in several surahs: Al-A'raf (7), Hud (11), Al- Hijr (15), Ash-Shu'ara (26), An-Naml (27), Al-Ankabut (29), As-Saffat (37), Ad-Dhariyat (51), Al-Qamar (54), Al-Haqqah (69), and others. Each surah adds a layer — the sin, the preaching, the visitors, the final night, the dawn, the rain, the wife who stayed, the ruins that remain.

This book — Qawm Lut: The People of the Rain — follows the same structure as the previous three: the people before the destruction, the prophet's preaching, the visitors who came, the final night, the destruction itself, the aftermath, the connections to the broader Quranic narrative, the lessons, and the reflections for the present. The story of Qawm Lut is the story of corruption innovated — the nation that invented a new sin and received a new destruction.

Chapter 1: The People of Lut — The First Corruption

Lut was the nephew of Ibrahim. The Quran establishes the relationship implicitly — Lut traveled with Ibrahim from their homeland, and Ibrahim settled Lut in the region of Sodom:

"And Lut believed him, and said: Indeed, I will emigrate to my Lord. Indeed, He is the Exalted in Might, the Wise" (29:26).

Lut was not merely a companion of Ibrahim; he was a prophet in his own right, sent to a specific people in a specific city. The Quran says:

"And to Lut [We sent] his brother Lut" — the Quranic phrase "their brother" (the pattern of all prophets) — though the exact phrase varies. In 26:161, the Quran says: "Their brother Lut said to them: Will you not fear Allah?"

The relationship between Ibrahim and Lut is significant: Ibrahim was the father of monotheism in Arabia, and Lut was his companion and kinsman. The message of Lut is the message of Ibrahim — tawhid — extended to a new people in a new city. The prophet who was sent to Sodom was the prophet who had learned tawhid from the one who revived it.

Sodom was a city of prosperity. The region of the Jordan valley was fertile — the Quran describes it as a land of gardens, springs, and crops:

"So We brought out those who believed in it [the city], and We found not within it except one house of Muslims" (51:35-36).

The prosperity of Sodom is the context of its corruption. The people who had gardens and springs were the people who had leisure — the time and the resources to pursue what no people had pursued before. Wealth is not the cause of corruption, but wealth is often the condition: the people who have much are the people who are tempted to use what they have for what they should not. Sodom was a city that had everything — and the city that used everything for the wrong.

The Quran does not describe the architecture of Sodom in the same detail as it describes the architecture of Aad (Iram) or Thamud (carved houses). The focus is not on what Sodom built but on what Sodom did. The city is defined by its sin, not its structures. The ruins that remain are not monuments of power but monuments of corruption — the ruins of a city that was known for what it practiced, not what it built.

The Quran describes the sin of Qawm Lut in specific terms:

"And [We sent] Lut when he said to his people: Do you commit such immorality as no one has preceded you with from among the worlds? Indeed, you approach men with desire, instead of women. Rather, you are a transgressing people" (7:80-81).

The phrase "no one has preceded you with from among the worlds" is the Quran's way of saying that Qawm Lut were the first. The sin was an innovation — not an inherited practice but an invented one. The people who committed this sin were not following a tradition; they were creating one. The innovation is the escalation: the people who inherit a sin can claim the excuse of custom; the people who invent a sin have no excuse at all.

The Quran specifies the nature of the sin: "you approach men with desire, instead of women" (7:81). The sin of Qawm Lut was the practice of homosexuality — the abandonment of the natural relationship between men and women for a relationship between men. The Quran calls it "immorality" (fahishah) — a word that means a gross, shameful, public act. The sin was not private; it was practiced openly, accepted socially, and defended publicly. The people of Sodom did not hide their sin; they celebrated it.

In addition to the sexual sin, the Quran alludes to other crimes of Qawm Lut. Lut says to them:

"And do not commit abomination in your meetings" (29:29).

The "abomination in meetings" has been understood by commentators to include highway robbery, assault of travelers, and public disorder. The people of Sodom were not merely practitioners of a sexual sin; they were a people of general corruption — a society where travelers were unsafe, where the roads were dangerous, and where the powerful preyed on the weak.

The combination of sins is the profile of a civilization that has lost its moral foundation. The people who abandon the natural order in their private lives also abandon the moral order in their public lives. The sin that is "first" — the sexual innovation — is the beginning of a cascade: the people who innovate in one area of morality innovate in others. The corruption spreads from the personal to the public, from the bedroom to the highway, from the private act to the social disorder.

The Quran reveals the social dynamics of Sodom through the story of the angels' visit. When the angels arrived in the city, disguised as handsome young men, the people of Sodom rushed to Lut's house:

"And his people came to him, rushing toward him, and they had been doing evil deeds" (11:78).

The word "rushing" (yahrahun) suggests urgency, excitement, and social coordination — the people did not come one by one but as a crowd. The sin was not an individual act; it was a communal one. The people who practiced it did not do so in secret but openly, collectively, and without shame. The crowd that rushed to Lut's door was the social expression of the sin: the community that normalizes corruption produces a community that acts on it collectively.

Lut's response reveals the social expectations of the city:

"He said: O my people, these are my daughters — they are purer for you. So fear Allah and do not disgrace me concerning my guests" (11:78).

The offer of his daughters is the cultural gesture — Lut, as the host and the elder, offers the protection of his household. The fact that the people refuse the offer reveals the depth of the corruption: the people who have abandoned women for men are not interested in women. The sin is not a preference; it is an identity. The people who have defined themselves by this sin cannot be redirected — the corruption is total.

Qawm Lut was the fourth destroyed nation — the fourth in a sequence that began with Qawm Nuh. The first nation had no precedent; the second had one; the third had two; the fourth had three. The accumulation of precedent continues: Qawm Lut knew (or could have known) of the flood, the wind, and the thunderbolt. Three destroyed nations were before them — and still they rejected.

But Qawm Lut's sin was different from the sins of the previous nations. Qawm Nuh, Aad, and Thamud rejected the prophet and the message; Qawm Lut rejected the prophet and the moral order. The previous nations were destroyed for idolatry and arrogance; Qawm Lut was destroyed for a specific, innovative, defining sin. The destruction of Qawm Lut is the proof that the moral order is not optional — the nation that violates the natural order is the nation that is removed from the natural order.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io