SAMPLE

Sleep and Rest: The Rhythm of Mercy

Rest and the Night in the Quran

Aira Aurora

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Introduction

Sleep occupies a third of human life. The average person will spend approximately twenty-five years asleep — more time than they will spend eating, socializing, or at work. Yet sleep is rarely discussed as a spiritual matter. It is treated as downtime, a biological pause between the moments that matter. The Quran takes a different view.

The Quran mentions sleep more than a dozen times, using three distinct words that describe different aspects of the experience. Nawm is ordinary sleep — the nightly rest that refreshes the body. Ru'ya is the dream — the images and experiences that pass through the sleeping mind. Hawb refers to the deep sleep that removes consciousness entirely. Each word appears in a specific context, and together they paint a picture of sleep as a divine gift, a sign of Allah's mercy, and a preparation for the ultimate sleep — death.

In Surah Al-Furqan, Allah says:

"And it is He who has made the night for you as clothing and sleep as rest, and has made the day for resurrection" (25:47).

This single verse captures the Quran's entire theology of rest. The night is a garment — something that covers, comforts, and protects. Sleep is rest — a cessation of labor, a gift of peace. The day is resurrection — a waking, a rising, a return to activity. The rhythm of night and day, sleep and waking, is not merely a biological cycle; it is a pattern that mirrors the relationship between this world and the next, between effort and repose, between the temporary and the eternal.

This book examines what the Quran says about sleep and rest — the night as a covering, sleep as a mercy, the alternation of day and night as a sign, the connection between sleep and death, the night prayer as a voluntary rising while others sleep, the balance of work and rest, the Quranic view of dreams, the etiquette of sleep, and the concept of the Sabbath as a day of commanded rest. It draws primarily from the Quran as its source, with Hadith clearly distinguished where referenced.

This is the fifth book in the Life in the Quran sub-series of the NurOne series. The first four books covered marriage, children, work, and food. This book covers the rest that makes all of those possible — the sleep that restores the body that works, the rest that refreshes the mind that studies, and the night that provides the silence in which the soul can hear.

Let us begin, as the Quran begins its guidance on rest, with the night as a covering and sleep as a mercy from Allah.

Chapter 1: The Night as a Cover

The Quran describes the night as a garment. In Surah Al-Furqan:

"And it is He who has made the night for you as clothing and sleep as rest, and has made the day for resurrection" (25:47).

The word libas — clothing, garment — is used for the night. A garment covers, protects, and provides comfort. The night covers the world in darkness, not as an absence but as a presence — a covering that signals the end of labor and the beginning of rest. The day reveals; the night conceals. The day exposes the world to activity; the night wraps it in stillness.

This metaphor is not merely poetic. It establishes the Quran's understanding of rest as something that covers and protects the human being. Just as a garment shields the body from cold and exposure, the night shields the human being from the endless demands of daylight. Without the night, there would be no stopping point — the human being would work until collapse. The night is a covering that says: stop, rest, let the world wait.

The Quran presents the night as a deliberate creation, not an accident of cosmology. In Surah An-Naba:

"And We made your sleep for rest, and made the night as a covering, and made the day for livelihood" (78:9-11).

Three things are mentioned in sequence: sleep for rest, the night as a covering, and the day for livelihood. Each has a purpose. Sleep is not a biological accident; it is a provision for rest. The night is not the leftover of the day; it is a covering designed for a function. The day is not merely the absence of night; it is the time for earning, building, and working.

The sequence — rest, covering, livelihood — reveals the Quran's rhythm of life. Rest comes first, before work. The night precedes the day. The sleep precedes the waking. This is not the order of importance — work is clearly essential — but the order of design: Allah gives rest before He gives labor, because the ability to rest is what makes sustained labor possible.

The Quran repeatedly pairs night and day as complementary signs. In Surah Al-Imran:

"The creation of the heavens and the earth, the alternation of night and day — indeed in that are signs for those of understanding" (3:190).

And in Surah Al-An'am:

"And it is He who created the heavens and the earth in truth. And the day He says: Be, and it is. His word is the truth. And His is the dominion the day the trumpet is blown. He is the Knower of the unseen and the witnessed, and He is the Wise, the Acquainted" (6:73).

The alternation of night and day is presented as one of the most persistent signs of Allah's creative power. Unlike the seasons, which change slowly, the alternation of day and night is immediate and daily — a sign that reappears every twenty-four hours, a reminder that occurs before every sleep and after every waking. The person who sees the night as a covering and the day as a resurrection is seeing a parable of the entire human existence played out in miniature every single day.

The Quran uses the night as a time for reflection. In Surah Al-Muzzammil: "O you who wraps himself in clothing, arise to stand in the night, except for a little — half of it, or subtract from it a little, or add to it, and recite the Quran with measured recitation" (73:1-4).

The night is not only for sleeping. It is also for standing, reflecting, and reciting. The stillness of the night — the absence of noise, the withdrawal of the world — creates a space for the soul that the day cannot provide. The Quran commands the believer to use some of the night for worship, not because the day is insufficient, but because the night offers a quality of attention that the day's distractions make difficult.

In Surah Al-Isra:

"And a part of the night, keep awake with it as an extra offering for you, that your Lord may raise you to a praised station" (17:79).

This verse, addressed to the Prophet Muhammad, establishes the night as a time for voluntary worship — an "extra offering" beyond the obligatory prayers. The person who rises in the night, while the world sleeps, is engaging in a form of worship that the Quran describes as a path to a "praised station" — a position of honor before Allah.

The Quran presents the night as a form of protection. In Surah An-Nahl:

"And Allah has made for you from your homes a place of rest, and made for you from the hides of the animals tents which you find light on the day of your travel and your day of encampment, and from their wool, fur, and hair, furnishing and enjoyment for a time" (16:80).

While this verse is about homes, the principle extends to the night. The night is a home — a place of rest, shelter, and protection. The darkness of the night shields the sleeper from the demands of the world, just as the walls of a home shield the inhabitant from the elements. The night is a covering in the fullest sense: it covers the body, the mind, and the spirit, giving them the space to recover from the exposure of the day.

The Quran's description of the night as a covering is ultimately a description of mercy. Allah did not have to create the night. He did not have to design a rhythm of work and rest. He could have made a world of perpetual daylight, where the human being would work without ceasing until exhaustion. Instead, He created the night — a covering that says: you may stop now. The work will wait. The world will wait. Rest.

The person who understands the night as a covering understands rest as a gift, not as a weakness. The culture that glorifies sleeplessness — that treats the need for rest as a flaw and the ability to work without stopping as a virtue — has misunderstood the design of the human being. The Quran's guidance is clear: the night is a garment, sleep is a rest, and the day is for resurrection. The rhythm is divine, and the believer who honors it is following a pattern that Allah Himself designed.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io