SAMPLE

The Conquest of Makkah: Bloodless Victory

The Entry Foretold (48:27)

Aira Aurora

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Introduction

Makkah. The city that had driven the Prophet out, persecuted his followers, mocked his message, and waged three wars against him. The city that had tried to starve him into submission, to kill him in his sleep, to erase the word of Allah from the earth. That city — the most sacred city in the world — opened its gates without a sword being drawn.

The Conquest of Makkah, which took place in Ramadan of the eighth year after the Hijrah (630 CE), is one of the most extraordinary events in human history. Not because of the military achievement — there was almost no military achievement. Not because of the bloodshed — there was almost no bloodshed. It is extraordinary because it was a conquest of mercy, a victory won not by the sword but by the character of the one who won it.

The Quran frames this event in two surahs: Surah Al-Fath (48), revealed in stages around the Treaty of Hudaybiyyah and fulfilled at the Conquest, and Surah An-Nasr (110), the second-to-last surah to be revealed, which looks at the Conquest as the beginning of the end — the moment when the mission entered its final phase.

Between these two revelations lies a story of patience, strategy, and mercy that the Quran tells not as a sequence of battles but as a moral drama. The Prophet is not a general in these surahs. He is a servant who was given a promise, tested in its deferral, and then given its fulfillment on terms he did not expect. The Quran's interest is not in how the city was taken. It is in what the taking reveals about the character of the believer and the nature of divine help.

This book examines the Conquest of Makkah as the Quran presents it: not as a military campaign but as a divine promise fulfilled, a test of character, and a lesson in what power looks like when it is guided by mercy. It traces the story from the Treaty of Hudaybiyyah — which the Quran called a victory when everyone else called it a defeat — through the violation that triggered the march, to the morning when the Prophet entered the city with his head bowed in gratitude and his heart set on forgiveness.

Along the way, we will examine the key Quranic passages that frame this event, the moral principles they establish, and the personal lessons they hold for every reader who faces their own Makkah — the seemingly impregnable challenge that only patience and mercy can open.

Chapter 1: The Treaty That Preceded the Victory

In the sixth year after the Hijrah, the Prophet Muhammad had a dream. He saw himself entering the Sacred Mosque with his companions, heads shaved or hair trimmed, feeling secure. The dream was clear. It was a promise. But the journey to fulfill that promise would test everything — the patience of the Prophet, the faith of his companions, and the meaning of trust in Allah's word when the visible circumstances say otherwise.

The Prophet set out from Madinah with approximately 1,400 companions. They were not an army. They carried no weapons of war. They had with them animals for sacrifice. Their intention was Umrah — the lesser pilgrimage. They were pilgrims, not soldiers. They brought the sacrificial animals with them, and they announced their intention publicly. The Quran refers to this moment: "Allah had fulfilled His messenger's vision in truth: you shall enter the Sacred Mosque, if Allah wills, in security, with heads shaved or hair trimmed, fearing nothing" (48:27). The verse was revealed later, but the promise it contained was already in motion from the moment the dream was given.

The Quranic word for the dream is ru'ya — a vision, not a passing wish. In the Quran, a Prophet's vision is a form of revelation. It carries the weight of divine promise. When the Prophet saw himself entering the Sacred Mosque, it was not a hope. It was a certainty. But the path from the vision to the fulfillment would require the Muslims to face a situation that, to every visible measure, looked like failure.

The Quraysh of Makkah, hearing of the Prophet's approach, sent their cavalry to block him. They had no intention of letting the Muslims perform Umrah. The sacred territory, which they claimed to protect, was being used as a political weapon — a gate to be opened or closed at their discretion. The Prophet and his companions stopped at a place called Hudaybiyyah, on the edge of the sacred territory.

His camel, al-Qaswa, refused to move further. The Prophet took this as a sign that they should camp. The companions were confused. They had expected to enter Makkah. Now they were stuck at a waterless plain. The situation was tense. The Quraysh had sent their most aggressive negotiators. The Prophet sent envoys in return, each one rejected or poorly treated.

Uthman ibn Affan was sent as the Prophet's final envoy. He was chosen because he was from the Banu Umayyah clan of the Quraysh — he had family ties in Makkah that might protect him. But Uthman was detained. A rumor reached the Muslim camp that he had been killed. The Prophet called his companions to pledge their loyalty under a tree — the famous Bay'at al-Ridwan, the Pledge of Pleasure. The Quran records this: "Certainly, Allah was pleased with the believers when they pledged allegiance to you under the tree" (48:18).

The pledge was a willingness to fight to the death if needed. It was not a pledge of aggression. It was a pledge of resolve. And the Quran's approval of it — "Allah was pleased with them" — elevates this moment to one of the most significant in the entire Seerah. Allah's pleasure was not with a military action. It was with the willingness to stand firm.

Uthman returned alive. A treaty was negotiated. Its terms, on the surface, looked like a surrender. The Muslims would not perform Umrah that year. They would return to Madinah and come back the following year. There would be a ten-year truce. Any tribe that wished to ally with the Quraysh could do so. Any tribe that wished to ally with the Muslims could do so. And — the most painful clause — any person who left Makkah to join the Muslims in Madinah without permission would be returned to the Quraysh.

The companions were devastated. They had expected to enter Makkah. They had dreamed of it. Now they were turning back. Some wept. Some questioned. The Prophet's scribe, when told to write the agreement, hesitated at the wording. The Prophet insisted. He accepted the terms, and the Quran called it "a clear victory" — Fath Mubin (48:1).

How could a retreat be a victory? The Quran saw what the companions could not. The treaty removed the barrier of war and opened a space for dialogue. In that space, Islam would spread faster than it ever had during conflict. The deferral of the dream was not a denial. It was a strategy — Allah's strategy.

Before Hudaybiyyah, the Muslims and the Quraysh were in a state of constant conflict. After Hudaybiyyah, there was peace. And in that peace, Islam spread faster than it ever had during war. People who had feared to openly discuss Islam now debated it freely. Tribes that had been caught between the two sides now chose. Within two years, the number of Muslims multiplied dramatically.

The Quran's framing of Hudaybiyyah as a victory was not spin. It was foresight. The treaty removed the barrier of war and let the message of Islam do what weapons could not: change hearts. The dream was not forgotten. It was deferred — and the deferral itself was part of the plan.

The companions did not see this at the time. They saw a retreat. They saw terms that humiliated them. They saw a delay in the fulfillment of a divine promise. But the Quran's perspective is always longer. It sees the end from the beginning. And the beginning of the Conquest of Makkah was not a march. It was a treaty that looked like a defeat.

The following year, the Prophet returned with his companions to perform the Umrah that had been deferred. The Quraysh, bound by the treaty, vacated the city for three days. The Muslims entered, performed the Tawaf, and left. The dream was partially fulfilled. But the full fulfillment — the permanent opening of the city — was still to come.

This brief Umrah was itself a form of da'wah. The people of Makkah saw the Muslims for the first time not as an enemy army but as worshippers. They saw the discipline, the unity, the devotion. The Quran describes the believers: "You see them bowing and prostrating, seeking bounty from Allah and His pleasure" (48:29). The Quraysh saw this with their own eyes. And what they saw began to change what they believed.

The Quran's treatment of Hudaybiyyah establishes a principle that runs throughout the text: divine promises are fulfilled, but rarely on the timeline we expect. The dream of entering the Sacred Mosque was true. But it was fulfilled in stages — first the Umrah of the following year, then the full Conquest two years after the treaty. Each stage was a test. Each stage required patience. And each stage deepened the meaning of the fulfillment when it finally arrived.

The Quran says: "And whoever fears Allah, He will make for him a way out. And He will provide for him from where he does not expect" (65:2-3). The way out of Hudaybiyyah was not through the door the companions expected. It was through the door of the treaty — the door that looked like a trap but was actually a passage.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io