Introduction

Work in the Quran is not presented as a curse or a punishment. It is presented as a means of seeking Allah's provision, a form of worship, and a responsibility that carries both dignity and accountability. The Quran addresses work, trade, earning, and spending across dozens of verses, creating a framework that governs every aspect of economic life — from the intention behind earning to the manner of spending.

This book examines what the Quran says about work and earning — the dignity of labor, the pursuit of provision, the distinction between lawful and unlawful earnings, the rules of trade, the prohibition of interest, the ethics of contracts, the obligation of charity, the danger of greed, and the balance between work and worship. It draws primarily from the Quran as its source, with Hadith clearly distinguished where referenced.

The Quran's guidance on work is comprehensive. It addresses the individual's relationship with their earnings, the community's responsibility toward the poor, the ethics of business transactions, and the spiritual dimension of labor. Each of these topics is treated with specific commands and principles that together form a framework for understanding work as the Quran presents it.

This is the third book in the Life in the Quran sub-series of the NurOne series. The first book covered marriage. The second covered children. This book covers the means by which the family is sustained — the work that puts food on the table, the earning that fulfills the obligation of provision, and the ethics that keep earning within the boundaries of what Allah has permitted.

Let us begin, as the Quran begins the discussion of work, with the dignity of labor and the pursuit of provision.

Chapter 1: The Dignity of Labor

The Quran presents work not as a mundane necessity but as a means of fulfilling one's purpose. In Surah Al-Jumu'ah, Allah says:

"And when the prayer has been concluded, disperse within the land and seek the bounty of Allah, and remember Allah often that you may succeed" (62:10).

This verse places work and worship side by side. The believers are commanded to pray, and when the prayer is over, they are commanded to "seek the bounty of Allah" — to work, to trade, to earn. The transition from prayer to work is not a descent from the sacred to the secular; it is a continuation of the same obedience. The work that follows prayer is itself a form of remembrance, if it is done with the right intention.

The Quran presents the prophets as workers. Musa (Moses) worked as a shepherd and later as a hired hand. In Surah Al-Qasas, Musa says:

"I will work for you for a term" (28:27).

Ibrahim (Abraham) was a builder — he raised the foundations of the Kaaba with his son Ismail:

"And when Ibrahim was raising the foundations of the House and with him Ismail: Our Lord, accept it from us" (2:127).

Dawud (David) was a craftsman:

"And We certainly gave Dawud from Us bounty. O mountains, repeat with him praise, and the birds. And We made iron soft for him: Make coats of mail and measure well the links" (34:10-11).

Sulayman (Solomon) was a builder and organizer of large-scale projects. The Quran records his supervision of the construction of the temple and his management of resources. Nuh (Noah) was a shipbuilder. Yusuf (Joseph) was a minister of finance and agriculture.

The Quran does not present the prophets as men who sat in contemplation while others worked. They worked with their hands, managed resources, built structures, and earned their living. The dignity of labor in the Quran is established by the example of Allah's chosen servants.

The Quran discourages idleness and calls upon believers to be active and productive. In Surah Al-Muzzammil, Allah says:

"And establish prayer and give zakah and loan Allah a goodly loan. And whatever good you put forward for yourselves, you will find it with Allah. It is better and greater in reward" (73:20).

This verse, while addressing prayer and charity, also establishes the principle of forward action — "whatever good you put forward for yourselves." The believer is called to act, to contribute, to build. Idleness is not a virtue in the Quran; it is a waste of the capacity that Allah has given.

The Prophet Muhammad is reported to have said:

"No one ever eats better food than that which he eats from the work of his own hands. The Prophet of Allah, Dawud, used to eat from the work of his own hands." (Sahih Bukhari)

This Hadith elevates self-earned provision to the highest standard. The believer who works and earns from their own labor follows the example of the prophets.

The Quran recognizes that not all people have the same capacity for work. In Surah Al-Nisa:

"And do not covet that by which Allah has made some of you excel others. For men is a share of what they have earned, and for women is a share of what they have earned. And ask Allah of His bounty. Indeed, Allah is ever Knowing of all things" (4:32).

This verse establishes that earning is tied to effort and ability — each person earns according to their own capacity. It also prohibits envy of what others have been given, directing the believer to seek provision from Allah rather than resenting the provision of others.

The Quran clarifies that the purpose of earning is not accumulation but sustenance and charity. In Surah Al-Baqarah:

"And spend in the way of Allah and do not throw yourselves with your own hands into destruction. And do good, indeed Allah loves the doers of good" (2:195).

The phrase "do not throw yourselves with your own hands into destruction" has been interpreted by scholars to include both the refusal to spend (which leads to ruin) and the refusal to work (which leads to poverty). The verse calls for balance — earn, spend in the way of Allah, and do good. The purpose of earning is not to hoard but to sustain oneself and to give.

The dignity of labor, as the Quran presents it, is not based on the type of work or the amount earned. It is based on the intention behind the work, the manner in which it is done, and the way the earnings are used. The prophet who builds a ship, the king who crafts armor, the shepherd who tends sheep, the merchant who trades fairly — all are engaged in dignified labor when their work is honest, their intention is pure, and their earnings are used as Allah has commanded.

The Quran establishes the dignity of labor through its repeated emphasis on earning through honest work. The principle is that the believer should earn their sustenance through their own effort, not through exploitation, begging, or dishonest means. The Prophet is reported to have said that the best earning is that from the work of one's own hands. The principle elevates manual labor from a merely economic activity to a moral one. The laborer who works honestly is the laborer who worships through their work, and the work itself becomes a form of devotion when it is performed with honesty and sincerity.
