Introduction

Yahya (عليه السلام) —�John the Baptist — is the prophet who was given a name no one had borne before. He is the son of Zakariya, born to an old father and a barren mother through the power of Allah's promise. He is the forerunner of Isa, the one who came to prepare the way for the Messiah. He is the prophet of purity, compassion, and devotion — a young man whose life was brief but whose peace covers three eternal moments: his birth, his death, and his resurrection.

The Quran tells Yahya's story not as an independent narrative but as part of the story of Zakariya. Yahya appears in Surah Al Imran (3:39) as the answer to his father's prayer, in Surah Maryam (19:2-15) as the gift of Allah's mercy, and in Surah Al-An'am (6:85) in the list of prophets "of the righteous." His individual story is brief — a few verses that describe his qualities more than his actions. But the qualities are extraordinary: honorable, chaste, a prophet, wise, compassionate, pure, dutiful, and enveloped in peace.

The Quran gives Yahya a unique honor: the peace formula that covers his entire existence. "Peace be upon him the day he was born and the day he dies and the day he is raised alive" (19:15). This threefold peace — birth, death, resurrection — is given to only a few prophets in the Quran. Yahya is one of them. The peace is the Quran's verdict on a life that was short, intense, and entirely dedicated to Allah.

Islamic tradition identifies Yahya with John the Baptist of the Christian tradition — the prophet who lived in the wilderness, who called people to repentance, who baptized, and who was killed by a tyrant. The Quran does not narrate these events in detail, but it confirms the essential: Yahya was a prophet, he was righteous, he was the forerunner of Isa, and his life was enveloped in divine peace.

This book traces Yahya's story through the Quran: his miraculous birth, his unique name, his qualities as described in the Quran, his role as the forerunner of Isa, his devotion to his parents, the threefold peace, and the lessons for every person who seeks to live a life of purity, compassion, and dedication. It is the twenty-third light in the NurOne - The Prophets series — the light that was given a name no one had borne, the light that prepared the way, the light that was enveloped in peace from birth to resurrection.

The Quran's description of Yahya is not a narrative but a portrait. The Quran does not tell us what Yahya did; it tells us who Yahya was. The portrait is painted with qualities: honorable, chaste, prophet, righteous, wise, compassionate, pure, dutiful, peaceful. Each quality is a brushstroke; together they form the image of a life that was entirely dedicated to Allah. The portrait is the teaching — the character is the lesson. whoever sees the portrait of Yahya and asks "what did he do?" has missed the point. whoever sees the portrait and asks "who was he?" has understood.

The qualities of Yahya are both human and divine. The honor, the chastity, the dutifulness — these are human qualities, the result of the prophet's own discipline and choice. The tenderness, the purity, the peace — these are divine qualities, given by Allah from Himself. The combination of human and divine is the Quran's theology of the prophetic character: the prophet who cultivates the human qualities receives the divine qualities. The soil is human; the fruit is divine. The prophet who prepares the ground receives the harvest.

The connection between Yahya and Isa is the connection between the preparation and the fulfillment. Yahya was the voice; Isa was the word. Yahya was the preparation; Isa was the arrival. Yahya was the bridge; Isa was the destination. The forerunner and the Messiah are two aspects of the same divine plan — the plan that unfolds in stages, each stage necessary, each prophet a link. The forerunner's greatness is not diminished by the Messiah's greater prominence; the forerunner's greatness is in the preparation that made the Messiah's reception possible.

This is the twenty-third book in the NurOne - The Prophets series, and it brings us to the threshold of the final two: Isa and Muhammad. The remaining prophets — Isa, the Messiah of miracles, and Muhammad, the final messenger — will complete the series. As we approach the end, the stories become more complex, the prophets more multidimensional, and the lessons more universal. Yahya, standing between the prayer of his father and the mission of the Messiah, is the bridge between the old and the new — the last of the preparatory prophets, the one whose purity and peace point toward the one who will bring the message to its final form.

The Quran offers a portrait of Yahya as a prophet given wisdom in childhood and a unique distinction: his name. In Surah Maryam, Allah says: "O Yahya, take the Scripture with determination. And We gave him judgment while still a youth, and affection from Us and purity, and he was righteous. And dutiful to his parents, and he was not a disobedient tyrant" (19:12-14). The Quran describes Yahya with five qualities: judgment in youth, affection from Allah, purity, righteousness, and dutifulness to his parents. No other prophet in the Quran is described with exactly this combination of qualities. Yahya's story is brief but his character is drawn with precision — a prophet who was gentle, pure, obedient, and wise from his earliest years.

In a related verse, the Quran says of Yahya: "And peace be upon him the day he was born, and the day he dies, and the day he is raised alive" (19:15). This threefold peace — at birth, at death, and at resurrection — is given to only three figures in the Quran: Yahya, Isa, and Ibrahim. The peace at birth announces that the life is blessed from its beginning. The peace at death announces that the end is safe. The peace at resurrection announces that the return to Allah is a return of honor. The Quran uses Yahya to show that a prophetic life does not need to be long to be complete. His story occupies a few verses, but his rank among the prophets is secure, and the peace placed on his name in the Quran is permanent.

Additionally, the Quran records the circumstances of Yahya's birth in Surah Maryam. After Zakariya's prayer, Allah says: "He said: Your sign is that you will not speak to the people for three nights, sound" (19:10). The sign was silence. Zakariya, who had been told his prayer was answered, would not be able to speak for three nights. The Quran sets before us this not as a punishment but as a sign — a physical confirmation that the promise was real. Zakariya emerged from the chamber and could only gesture to the people to glorify Allah morning and evening. The silence itself became the announcement. The man who had prayed for a son could not speak, but the people around him could see that something extraordinary had happened. The example of this reveals that some gifts from Allah are so great that they leave the recipient speechless — literally.

The Quran reinforces this of Yahya in Surah Maryam: "And peace be upon him the day he was born, and the day he dies, and the day he is raised alive" (19:15). The threefold peace is significant. It covers the entire arc of Yahya's existence: birth, death, and resurrection. The Quran gives this complete peace to almost no one else. The implication is that Yahya's entire life was under divine protection — from the moment of his unusual birth to an old father and a barren mother, to the moment of his prophethood given in childhood, to the moment of his death, to the moment of his resurrection. The Quran does not record the circumstances of his death in detail. It states what matters: peace at every stage. The chapters that follow examine every verse about Yahya, his family, his prophethood, and the qualities the Quran assigns to him, always holding the text as the primary source for understanding his significance.

The Quran describes Yahya as the only prophet whose name was given directly by Allah. In Surah Maryam, Allah says through the angel: "So the angels called him while he was standing in prayer in the chamber: Allah gives you glad tidings of Yahya, confirming a word from Allah, and honorable, chaste, and a prophet from among the righteous" (3:39). The name Yahya means "he lives" — a name given to a child born to parents who were both beyond the age of having children. The life of Yahya was itself a sign: the man who was named Living was given life when life was impossible.

The example of Yahya reveals that the signs of Allah are not always thunder and fire. Sometimes the sign is a quiet birth to an old father and a barren mother. Sometimes the sign is a child who speaks with wisdom before he is grown. Sometimes the sign is a name given by the One who named him before he was born. The chapters that follow trace the complete story of Yahya and his family across the surahs where they appear, always with the Quran as the primary source.

The example of Yahya reveals that a prophetic life does not need to be long to be complete. He was given wisdom in childhood, purity from birth, and peace at every stage. His name, meaning Living, was given by Allah to a child born when life was impossible. The Quran preserves him as a portrait of what a life looks like when it is given entirely to the One who gave it.

The Quran says about Yahya in Surah Maryam: And We gave him judgment while still a youth, and affection from Us and purity, and he was righteous. And dutiful to his parents, and he was not a disobedient tyrant. So peace be upon him the day he was born, and the day he dies, and the day he is raised alive. The passage gives five qualities and one threefold peace. The qualities: judgment in youth, affection from Allah, purity, righteousness, and dutifulness to parents. The peace: at birth, at death, and at resurrection. No other prophet in the Quran receives exactly this combination. Yahya's portrait is unique, concise, and complete. The Quran gives him what it gives no one else: a life described in five words and a peace covering three stages of existence.

The example of Yahya reveals that a life given entirely to Allah is the most complete life, regardless of its length or the events it contains.

Chapter 1: Yahya in the Quran

Yahya (عليه السلام)appears in the Quran in several passages:

Surah Al Imran (3:39): The angelic announcement to Zakariya: "Allah gives you good tidings of Yahya, confirming a word from Allah and [who will be] honorable, chaste, and a prophet from among the righteous."

Surah Maryam (19:7-15): The most detailed passage. Covers the granting of the name Yahya, the qualities of the son, the instruction to take the Scripture with determination, and the threefold peace.

Surah Al-Anbiya (21:90): "So We responded to him and gave him Yahya and amended for him his wife."

Surah Al-An'am (6:85): "And Zakariya and Yahya and Isa and Ilyas — each was of the righteous."

The name Yahya means "he lives." It is a name of life given to the son of an old man and a barren woman — the child who came from the place where life was not expected. The name is the theology: Allah brings life from death, fruitfulness from barrenness, continuation from termination.

The Quran says: "He said: I have been given the name Yahya, and We had not before given the name to anyone" (19:7). The uniqueness of the name is emphasized: no one before Yahya had been given this name by Allah. The uniqueness marks the significance. The child who was the answer to a prayer offered in a whisper was given a name that no one had borne — a name that is itself a statement of divine power.

The Quran describes Yahya as "confirming a word from Allah" (3:39). The "word" — kalima — refers to Isa, who is called "a word from Him" (3:45, 4:171). Yahya's mission was to confirm the coming of Isa — to prepare the people for the Messiah, to announce that the prophesied one was near.

The role of the forerunner is significant: the forerunner does not bring the message himself; the forerunner prepares the way for the message. Yahya was not the Messiah; he was the one who pointed to the Messiah. His prophethood was defined by its relationship to another prophet — the one who came after him. The forerunner's greatness is not in being the main figure but in being the necessary figure — the one without whom the main figure would arrive to an unprepared people.

In Surah Al-An'am (6:85), Yahya is listed alongside Zakariya, Isa, and Ilyas, and all are described as "of the righteous" — min al-salihin. The list connects four prophets across generations: the father (Zakariya), the son (Yahya), the Messiah (Isa), and the earlier prophet (Ilyas). The righteousness is the quality that unites them. The son who was given in answer to a prayer is "of the righteous" — the answer was not just a child but a righteous child, a child whose life would be defined by the same quality that characterized his father.

The Quran gives Yahya a unique honor:

"Peace be upon him the day he was born and the day he dies and the day he is raised alive" (19:15).

The threefold peace covers three moments: birth (yawm wulida), death (yawm yamutu), and resurrection (yawm yuhshar hayy). The peace encompasses the entire existence — from the first breath to the last and beyond. The life that begins in peace, ends in peace, and is raised in peace is the life that is entirely enveloped in the peace of Allah.

This peace formula is given to only a few prophets in the Quran — Ibrahim (37:109), Musa (37:120), Ilyas (37:130), and Yahya (19:15). The inclusion of Yahya in this select group is remarkable: a prophet whose narrative is brief, whose life was short, and whose story is told in a few verses is given the same honor as the prophets with the longest narratives. The peace is not proportional to the narrative; the peace is proportional to the life.
