Introduction

There is a shore in every volume of this series, and this volume finally gives the far side of it a tenant. The Hantu Laut, the Sea Ghost of the Malay register, is the tenant of open salt water, and the sources file him as no shape at all but as something rarer: a government. The sea-ghost's record has no single body to describe. It has instead a family scattered along the water (a father at the estuary, a mother upstream, a child in the middle reaches), a court of named officers (an Imam of the sea, a war- chief, elders stationed below, in the cove, and at the cape), a guardian perched at the masthead of whirlpool and boat, a friendship-contract offered to the coast-folk with betel and a white fowl, and a legendary tree at the navel of the sea around which the whole ocean is understood to turn.

The source is Skeat's Malay Magic, and this is the most civic file the series has yet opened. The tradition's definition line files the pair together as Water and "Sea-spirits," giving the inland waters to Volume 14's tenant and the open sea to this one. The names-register of the sea-ghost's own family runs: "Si Raya nama bapa-nya, tinggal di kuala, Madaruti nama mak-nya, tinggal di hulu, Wa' Ranai nama anak-nya, tinggal di tengah." The General Invocation summons the deep's whole establishment by post: "Imam An Jalil nama-nya Imam di laut, Bujang Ransang nama-nya hulubalang di laut, 'Nek Rendak nama-nya yang diam di bawah," with the cove and the cape each holding their own elder. The friendship rite of the Orang Laut binds three brothers of the current-rope with "roko' tiga batang, sirih tiga kapor, ayam puteh sa-ekor." And the whirlpool's guardian climbs the masthead, "dada-nya berbulu, mata-nya merah, kulit-nya hitam, rambut-nya kreting" — the boat's own watchman in the ghost's employ.

A word about what kind of book this is, and is not. The reader who comes expecting a catalog of terrors — a sea-serpent here, a luring maiden there — will find the file empty of them, and will find instead something the coast found more useful: a list of who to write to. This volume is a study of administration as a form of awe. The deepest respect the Malay coast paid the sea was not fear institutionalized but courtesy institutionalized, and the chapters that follow are that courtesy's paper trail.

The chapters walk the whole file. They begin at the definition and the split of the waters; they give the family its geography and the court its census; they sail out to the Pauh Janggi at the ocean's navel; they climb to the masthead guardian and contract the friendship before the crossing; they file the sea-king's many faces, the etiquette of passage that asks the ghosts to withdraw, the soul-gathering charm and the storm-fiend; and they close with the sea's own law — the doctrine of the landlord below the waterline, and the register of the waters at last complete.

One note on method, for the reader new to the series. Every Malay line in this volume comes from the cached primary texts, quoted exactly as recorded; the comparative canon stays in its proper frame; the modern register appears only as hedged retelling; and the readings — the family- as-map, the court-as-census, the contract-before-crossing — are this volume's own. Everything else belongs to the tradition that wrote it, and to the sea whose tenant it names.

A last word to the returning reader, who knows the series' habits. The birth-cosmology's siblings, the forest's hunters, the soil's demons, and the air's mambang have all had their volumes; the waters were the last province held open, and the Sea Ghost is the file that closes it. Expect the usual bench — Skeat's charm-book as the primary register, the peninsula's peoples as context, the comparative canon held at arm's length — and expect one novelty this volume earns honestly: where the earlier files described monsters, this one describes ministries, and the change is the sea's own doing. The deepest water in the Malay world was governed, addressed, and answered; the wonder of this file is not what haunted the Straits, but what answered when the coast wrote.

Chapter 1: What Is the Hantu Laut? The Tenant of Open Salt Water

The definition line is the register's cleanest act of taxonomy, and it is worth reading slowly, because a single clause divides the Malay world's whole hydrosphere between two tenants. The record names them together as "Water and Sea-spirits," and the difference is jurisdiction. The Hantu Ayer (Volume 14's tenant) holds the inland waters: the rivers, the fords, the waterfalls, the drowned places upstream. The Sea Ghost holds everything the river finally delivers itself to: the estuary's widening, the strait's traffic, the open water where the coast becomes a memory. The tradition kept the two apart, and this volume keeps them apart too: the file that follows is not the Water Ghost's file extended, but a separate estate with its own officers, its own etiquette, and its own geography of dread. The fisherman who charms the river and the skipper who salutes the sea are performing two different diplomacies against two different powers.

What makes the Sea Ghost hard to picture is what makes him central to this series: the register almost never gives him a face. The Polong is a smallness that enters through an intended doorway; the Penanggalan is a head that detaches for the night's work; the Hantu Tetek is a woman defined by one monstrous attribute. Ask what the Hantu Laut looks like and the primary sources answer with an organization chart. His family is a set of addresses. His court is a list of posts. His guardian is identified not by species but by duty, and by the masthead post he climbs to watch.

This is not a failure of the record but its doctrine: the sea is too large to be haunted by a single body, so the tradition filed it as territory — an estate tenanted by a household and administered by a hierarchy. The reader should hold that inversion in mind all through the volume. Elsewhere the register asks "what haunts this place?" and answers with a figure. Over open water it asks "who is in charge here?" and answers with a roster.

The series has now walked the full coastline of the Malay supernatural, and the sea is the last great province to be entered properly. Volume 14 gave the register the inland water's tenant; Volume 23 gave it the river's lord; between them the three prior water-files cover everything that flows. The open sea was always implied — the Straits carry the Annals' princesses and the traders' boats, and the mountain-princess of Volume 22 sent her riddles from Ledang's height across a landscape that finally ends at salt water. This volume completes the circuit: the waters register now has its estuary, its river, and its ocean, three tenants and three diplomacies.

And the completion is not merely cartographic. The sea-ghost's file is where the register's deepest habit — treating the unlivable as governed, the dangerous as contracted, the monstrous as addressed by name and post — reaches its fullest expression, because the sea is the one Malay landscape that never had a shore to retreat to. The rice-farmer could cede the deep forest; the village could move upstream from the drowned place. The coast-dweller's livelihood was the water itself. The register's answer was to people the water's far side with a government one could write to.

The chapters that follow file that government completely: the family on the water, the court of named officers, the sea's axial tree, the masthead guardian, the friendship contracted before the crossing, the king who wears many faces, the etiquette of passage, the startled soul and its gathering, and the law beneath the waterline. The sources are the series' usual bench — Skeat's Malay Magic as the primary register, the Pagan Races and the Annals as comparative and historical context — and every Malay line quoted in the volume is quoted exactly as the record keeps it. What the reader will meet is not a monster but an administration: the sea as the largest tenanted property in the register, and the Hantu Laut as its resident lord — the tenant of open salt water.

The definition line does more than split a jurisdiction; it implies a journey. A boat leaving the headwaters passes through the inland ghost's water first, then the river's governed length (where Volume 23's lord holds his covenant at the reaches), and finally crosses the estuary where the father of the sea-file keeps his gate — three tenants, three diplomacies, one continuous water. The register never says the three are enemies or rivals; the crocodile's oath names the water itself as his defense, the Water Ghost was born of the caul in the birth-cosmology, and the Sea Ghost's family holds addresses that reach inland.

The file suggests instead a federation: the powers of the water agree on its continuity, and the boat that has paid courtesy at the estuary is expected to arrive at the cape with its papers in order. What the tradition built, in other words, was not a wall at the tide- line but a border post — the kuala where Si Raya sits — and this volume is the record of what stands on the far side of that post, holding the whole salt-water estate in trust for a household the shore can name but never see.
