Introduction

Every house stands on someone's land. Every road cuts through someone's territory. In the Malay folk imagination, the "someone" under the ground has a name: the jembalang.

The jembalang is the earth spirit of the Malay world — a demon or spirit bound to a particular place, dwelling in the soil itself, and dangerous in a specific, practical way: it resists being disturbed. Dig its ground without asking, build on its land without offerings, clear its forest without ceremony, and the jembalang answers — with sickness, with accidents, with a foundation that will not hold. Appease it first, and the same ground gives no trouble at all.

Walter Skeat, in his 1900 classic Malay Magic, preserves the oldest English-language trace of the being: a footnote identifying "The Jĕmalang (Jĕmbalang)" as "a Malay earth-spirit," in a list of demons recorded a generation earlier by Abdullah Munshi, the father of modern Malay letters. The being Munshi named in the 1830s and Skeat glossed in 1900 is still believed in today. In modern Malaysia and Brunei, the jembalang tanah — the earth jembalang — is the reason construction projects hold groundbreaking rituals; the reason a contractor will not order excavation on a certain hillside until a bomoh has made the ground safe; the reason a workman who falls sick on a new site will tell you, without embarrassment, what was not done before the digging started.

This is the tenth volume in The Guardian's Shadow series. The beings of the earlier volumes were defined by their appetites — the pontianak's hunger, the toyol's thieving, the polong's violence. Even the bunian of Volume 9, gentle as they are, were defined by their hidden society. The jembalang is defined by something prior to all of that: place. It is the spirit of the ground itself, and its entire relationship with humanity is a territorial one. That makes it the most practical of all the beings in this series — the one whose beliefs are least about fear in the night and most about contracts, offerings, and the conduct of work.

The jembalang tradition is, at heart, a building code written in cosmology. It specifies when the ground may be opened (after permission, on the right day), what must be given when it is (offerings of eggs, rice, and — in the old accounts — blood), what happens when the code is violated (disease, accident, collapse), and who enforces the code (the pawang and bomoh, the ritual specialists of the Malay world). It is a tradition of the worksite, not the graveyard — of the axe and the spade, not the shroud.

And it is a tradition with an unusually honest core. Strip away the demonology and what remains is a proposition modern readers will recognise instantly:

development has costs that are not on the invoice. The ground does not give way for free. The jembalang is the Malay world's name for the invoice.

This volume follows the structure of the series: definition and taxonomy, origins and evolution, the being's world, its powers, its social role, the protective practices against it, its modern life, its moral teaching, the separation of fact from fiction, and its future. The jembalang rewards this treatment better than most beings in the series, because it is the clearest case study the Malay spirit world offers of a belief that works — a belief whose practice, whatever its truth, demonstrably kept builders careful, sites respected, and communities safe, for generations.

Chapter 1: What Is Jembalang?

The being appears in the record under a pair of spellings — jemalang and jembalang — that Skeat records together, and the modern standard form is jembalang. The etymology is obscure, which is itself informative: the word does not derive transparently from Arabic (like jinn/jin), Sanskrit religious vocabulary (like puaka, from bhuwana roots), or any obvious Malay root. It reads as a word of the old stratum — a native animist term that was already ancient when the traders and the imams arrived, and that needed no translation because everyone already knew what it named: the thing in the ground.

The definitions that survive are consistent about the essentials:

- Skeat (1900), glossing Abdullah Munshi's list of demons: "The Jĕmalang (Jĕmbalang) is a Malay earth-spirit." - The folklore compilations of modern Malaysia: "Jembalang tanah are earth demons, which may act dangerously if not appeased with the proper rituals." - The same compilations, under health spirits: "a jembalang, a demon or evil spirit that usually brings disease." - And the most precise modern gloss: "Hantu jembalang is a spirit that is bound to a certain area. If any construction is done at that area, offerings need to be made to appease it."

Four definitions, one being. The jembalang is (1) a spirit of the earth, (2) dangerous, (3) appeasable, and (4) territorial — bound to particular ground. Every chapter of this book is an elaboration of those four clauses.

The Malay spirit world is crowded at ground level, and the jembalang must be sorted from its neighbours precisely, because the entire folk ecology of place depends on the distinctions.

Jembalang tanah — the earth jembalang. The being of this book. Dwells in the soil; angered by disturbance of the ground; appeased by offerings before construction or clearing. The prefix tanah (earth, soil, land) is what distinguishes it from any local jembalang of other elements.

Penunggu — the dweller. A tutelary spirit of a particular place — caves, forests, mountains — that occupies rather than inhabits. The penunggu is a guardian of a site; the jembalang is closer to a spirit of the site. A penunggu can often be propitiated into becoming a protective ally; the jembalang is not an ally but a landlord — it does not guard for you, it collects from you.

Puaka — the nature spirit of a place. Closely overlapping with the jembalang in modern use, and often used interchangeably in everyday speech. The puaka is typically associated with wild and abandoned places — the compilations note puaka residing in abandoned buildings — and carries a stronger connotation of haunting and possession than the jembalang, whose interventions are practical: sickness at the worksite, the collapse of the excavation, the accident on the road.

Mambang — the ambient spirit. The mambang are spirits of natural phenomena and directions, mobile and diffuse; in the ancient Malay belief-system called kepoyangan, the mambang were small winged demon- fairies of the air, while the earth demons were their wingless counterparts in the soil. The mambang is in the weather; the jembalang is under the floor.

Jembalang as disease-spirit. A distinct strand of the tradition classifies the jembalang among the health-related spirits — the beings whose speciality is sickness. This strand makes the jembalang a name for the agencies that bring disease out of the ground, and it will matter enormously in Chapter 9, because the soils of the Malay peninsula really do carry disease, and the tradition knew it.

- Domain — Jembalang: The soil; bound ground; Penunggu: A site it occupies; Puaka: Wild/abandoned places; Mambang: Phenomena, directions, weather - Nature — Jembalang: Earth spirit; landlord of the ground; Penunggu: Tutelary dweller; guardian; Puaka: Nature spirit; haunter; Mambang: Ambient spirit; mobile - Triggered by — Jembalang: Digging, building, clearing, trespass; Penunggu: Entering, taking from the site; Puaka: Abandonment, invasion, possession attempts; Mambang: Offence, exposure, timing - Response — Jembalang: Disease, accidents, collapse; Penunggu: Blocking, leading astray, hauntings; Puaka: Haunting, possession; Mambang: Affliction, madness, fever - Remedy — Jembalang: Offering before work; appeasement after; Penunggu: Propitiation; asking permission; Puaka: Cleansing; bomoh intervention; Mambang: Avoidance; pawang's mediation - Temperament — Jembalang: Contractual — pay and it is placated; Penunggu: Neutral to protective; Puaka:

Wild; unpredictable; Mambang: Ancient; petty

Here the tradition is almost silent, and the silence is characteristic. The pontianak is described; the toyol is described; even the invisible bunian are described (beautiful, ancient dress, no philtrum). The jembalang is not described, because it is not met. It is not encountered on the path or seen at the treeline — it is underneath, and its presence is known only by its works: the fever that starts after the groundbreaking, the embankment that slips after the clearing, the trench that collapses without warning on the crew that did not make offering. The jembalang's face is the accident report.

Folk accounts that do venture a form give it the shape of its element: a dark, dwarfish figure of the soil, sometimes glimpsed at the edge of a clearing in the half-light, sometimes heard — a knocking under the ground. But the tradition's centre of gravity is not visual. The jembalang is the least visible of all the beings in this series, because it is the only one whose medium is the earth you stand on.

The jembalang is the earth spirit of the Malay world: a being bound to particular ground, dwelling in the soil, dangerous when disturbed, and appeasable by ritual. It is distinguished from the penunggu (a site's guardian), the puaka (a wild place's haunter), and the mambang (a mobile ambient spirit); in the old kepoyangan cosmology it is the wingless earth- demon counterpart of the airborne mambang. It has no stable appearance — it is known only by its works: the sickness and the accident that follow the unappeased disturbance of its ground.
