SAMPLE

The Vain Duelist

The Personality in Love With Its Own Excellence

Aiman Sterling

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Contents

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Vain Duelist at a Glance

Chapter 2: The Core — the Mirror Installed as Opponent

Chapter 3: The Instrument — the Flourish

Chapter 4: The Craft — the Form Perfected Past the Function

Chapter 5: The Honest Costs

Chapter 6: The Dark Side — the Defended Image

Chapter 7: The Vain Duelist at Work — Career, Teams, and the Boss Relationship

Chapter 8: The Vain Duelist in Love and Friendship

Chapter 9: The Matchups — Companions, Rivals, and the Other Types

Chapter 10: The Rose Turned Outward — the Duelist Outgrowing the Mirror

Afterword

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

You know this person, or you are this person. The one whose performance of the performance is the performance: the flourish after the point is already won; the outfit chosen for a gym where no one is watching, on the off chance someone is; the sentence re-said in the car because the first version was adequate; the charm deployed on entering a room before the room has been located — and the energy underneath is the paradox this bout sheet must keep in view: this is often a genuinely excellent person — the skill real, the discipline real, the win record real — and yet the bout sheet's opening finding is that none of that is the point; the point is the portrait: excellence cultivated, in every arena, primarily as something that can be seen; the duel as photo shoot; the victory incomplete until a witness signs it; and the commandment underneath, installed so early it feels like personality rather than decision: if it was not admired, it did not happen.

This is a case file on the Vain Duelist: the personality in love with its own excellence.

The founding scene is the sightline: the child whose beauty of motion drew crowds — the playground trick that gathered the older kids, the recital that made the relatives lean forward, the dive, the arabesque, the essay read aloud — and the praise that arrived, warm and repeated, for how it looked. Not the goal — the geometry of the goal. Not the effort — the effortlessness of the effort. The child stands in the applause and learns, in one season, the two lessons that will run a life: first, that the self is finest when observed — the crowd is not a tax on the talent; the crowd is the talent's completion; and second — the lesson the whole book orbits — that the applause was aimed at a portrait, and the portrait, unlike the child, never sweats, never doubts, never ages, and never has an off day; and the decision, made there, never spoken aloud, never revoked: I will be the portrait.

The mirror is installed as opponent, and opponent is the exact word: the Duelist fences with their own reflection daily, sparring for its approval, winning narrowly, never noticing the reflection cannot lose.

And the bout sheet will honor what deserves honoring, because the excellence is real: this is the circuit's most aesthetic competence — the mirror knight whose form is function's gift wrapping and sometimes its cause; the consultant whose slides are read, the surgeon whose sutures are small art, the teacher whose best hour is also the beautiful hour, the fighter whose footwork saves the knees; standards are carried on such spines, and this book will not pretend the love of the look is a rumor. But the ledger audits honestly, and this ledger's flaw is built into the first scar: a self organized around the portrait is a self organized against revision — and the Duelist's mirror, consulted daily, charges a strange interest: the feedback declined because it arrives in yesterday's light; the burnishing deferred because growing admits the prior self was wrong; the colleagues promoted past while the form stayed perfect; the rumor mill's plain sentence, held for the whole book: the Duelist has spent ten years defending the image — and the image, undefended for one afternoon, would have been fine.

And the shadow: the defended portrait — the perfect image maintained with imperfect means: the credit borrowed from quieter teammates because the portrait cannot be seen co-signed; the rival diminished, gently, with a compliment's scalpel; the age fought with every weapon the vanity can afford; the mirror consulted with a devotion that would be called, in any other context, love — and the bout sheet's most diagnostic finding: the Duelist does not fear losing — the rumor mill proves they can lose, regroup, and return; they fear looking bad, which is a different country, and the shadow's terminal condition is a life spent performing at a portrait that never ages while the performer, behind it, quietly does; the show impeccable, the audience long gone home.

And the growth: the rose aimed outward — not the vanity removed, the vanity re-aimed: the discovery, in the redeemed cases, that the portrait was never the enemy; the portrait was the first draft of a self that wanted to be worth looking at, and the worth was always the real cargo; that excellence turned toward a recipient — the student, the patient, the teammate, the work itself — outshines excellence turned toward the glass; the Duelist grown is the one who still irons the shirt, still polishes the line, still wins beautifully — and gives the win away, deliberately, to something outside the frame; the file's final finding: the reflection never loved you back — but the work, the team, the student, the rose aimed outward: those answer.

If you are this type, the fencer's catechism's wager is precise: the crowd that installed the portrait has been gone for years, and the applause you are still performing for is being issued by the mirror — which approves of everything you show it and has never once taught you anything. If you love one, your instruction is patient and exact: do not starve the praise — the praise is this type's oxygen, and removing it starts the shadow, not the burnishing; aim it instead at the substance: the decision, not the delivery; the assist, not the highlight; and when the Duelist does something excellent that cannot be photographed — the quiet fix, the unglamorous save — mark it, name it, admire it out loud, because you are teaching the portrait that it is allowed to have an inside.

Turn the page. The Duelist enters, and the room rearranges itself into an audience — but the file's promise is that the room is not the enemy either; the room was only ever the first place the child went looking for proof of worth, and the proof, the whole book will show, was portable all along: the rose aimed outward blooms in any light, watched or not — and the Duelist grown is the one who finally, comfortably, wins for two.

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Vain Duelist at a Glance

The tell, before a word is spoken, is the entrance studied as if it were improvised: watch the Duelist arrive anywhere — the meeting, the gym, the wedding, the corner shop — and clock the half-second of arrangement: the shoulder angle, the pause at the threshold that lets the room register the silhouette, the jacket adjusted with the economy of a person who has rehearsed the adjustment in a mirror and is performing the unrehearsed version of it; and the bout sheet's first finding is that the ease is real and manufactured at once — the Duelist is genuinely at home in sightlines, the way a fish is at home in water, and the home was built, board by board, in front of mirrors; the room is not embossed so much as addressed.

The second tell is the flourish economy: the unnecessary beauty attached to the necessary act — the signature that trails off into a waltz, the screwdriver spun once before the turn, the presentation slide with the typographic detail no budget asked for, the point already won and then won again, visually, for the record; and the file's careful entry: the flourish is not waste; the flourish is currency — the Duelist pays the audience a beauty tax on every transaction, and the audience's delight is the receipt. The third tell is the sentence re-said: the Duelist will circle back — in the same conversation, at the next meeting, in the car on the way home — to improve a line that was already fine: the joke's rhythm corrected, the phrasing re-fitted, the anecdote given a second, third, seventh draft aloud, because to this type the sentence is a portrait too, and the portrait can always hang straighter; and the file's finding on the manner as a whole: the Duelist lives in a gallery of one artist and one subject, and the subject attends every opening, and the opening is every day.

The backstory, gathered across the files, has one recurring room: the crowd that gathered for the form. The child who moved beautifully — the dive that made the pool go quiet, the essay read aloud to a class that stopped fidgeting, the trick on the pitch that collected the older kids — and the praise that came home attached, precisely, to the look of the thing: so graceful, so effortless, so lovely to watch. Not the goal — the geometry. Not the discipline — the seeming ease. And the child, standing in that warm repeat, installs the founding arithmetic: the excellence was mine, but the excellence came alive when it was watched; therefore the watching is part of the excellence.

The mirror is promoted from furniture to opponent — the daily sparring partner whose approval must be won before the room's can be attempted — and the sparring is the type's private religion, practiced daily, unremarked: the practiced smile in the lift's chrome, the walk corrected on the shop window's glass, the third take of the same sentence at the same mirror.

The file's sharp entry: the opponent cannot lose. The reflection approves everything, critiques nothing, ages invisibly inside its own frame — and the Duelist spends a life fencing an adversary whose whole strategy is agreement; the crowd that started the religion went home years ago; the applause being performed for now is issued, in full, by the glass.

The album's first photograph: the child at the recital finding the light — not the stage light; the audience's — the small tilt of the chin that reads, on the grainy video, as six-year-old star quality and is, diagnostically, six- year-old aim: the child has located where the watching comes from and turned the face into its address. The second photograph: the two versions of practice — the Saturday drill in the garden, unwatched, ordinary, effortful — and the same drill performed for the relatives, transfigured, the knees higher, the finish cleaner, the effort concealed; and the file's note on the gap: the gap is not dishonesty; the gap is the product — the second version is what the watching is for, and the child knows it at seven.

The third photograph: the loss of the unwatched contest — the spelling bee, the tournament, the exam — where the form held and the result wobbled, and the child's grief, oddly, was not about the loss; it was about the audience not being given something to applaud: "I played badly" meaning, on review, "I played unbeautifully"; the file's entry: the aesthetic was installed above the outcome so early that the two no longer separate. The fourth photograph: the teacher or coach who praised the work — the ugly drill, the repetition, the ordinary Tuesday — and the child's quiet, diagnostic coolness toward them, in favor of the teacher who praised the talent; the Duelist, at nine, already selecting their audience for the applause that maintains the portrait, and filing the honest praise as not quite the point.

Energy: High, gleaming, and performed — the Duelist's voltage is real and its delivery is art direction: the type runs on the joy of the watched motion, and the motion is dressed for the watching even when no watcher has been confirmed — the gym wardrobe, the made bed before the run, the notes in the better notebook; and the file's finding on the voltage: it peaks in company — the Duelist in an empty room is quieter, sadder, and more accurate than the Duelist in a full one; the audience is not a stimulant; the audience is the power source.

Ambition: Singular, vertical, and photographic — the type's ambition is not a portfolio; it is a gallery: one craft, mastered past competence into style, mounted at the angle where its excellence is most visible; the Duelist would rather be the best looking second in the world than an unaesthetic first, and the record's sharp entry: the type achieves — genuinely, repeatedly — but the achievement is curated, chosen partly for how it will hang in the hall; the ambition's honest name is not success; it is display — the self as its own finest exhibition.

Vanity structure: The portrait — the self's proof is the image maintained: the physique kept camera-ready, the reputation kept spotless, the anecdote kept polished, the flaws restored nightly in front of the glass; and the bout sheet's finding on the vanity's trap, the deepest in this volume: the portrait must not change — growth, which asks the mirror knight to be a beginner again, admits the prior self was wrong, and the portrait cannot have been wrong; so the Duelist polishes what is, and declines what is next; the vanity is not pride in the self; it is identity fused to the image of the self, and the image's only commandment is hold.

Loyalty: Charming, generous, and audience-shaped — the Duelist remembers birthdays beautifully, defends friends in public with swordsmanship, gives the compliment that gets repeated for years; and the file's honest entry: the loyalty is real, and it is rendered in front of witnesses — the type's kindness prefers a gallery; the unwatched favor is done too, but it is done quietly, and then mentioned, because a portrait's virtues must hang somewhere they can be seen; the cost, gathered across the files: the friend who stops attending the exhibition — who no longer claps — is not fought; they are retired from the rotation, with perfect manners and a warmer smile than the friendship ever got.

Weakness: The witness dependency — everything the Duelist cannot do is a form of performing unobserved: the honest practice that no one applauds, the ugly first draft, the novice's white belt, the feedback that arrives in yesterday's light; and the blindness riding with it: the type genuinely believes the excellence is the excellence-plus-the-applause — the founding's oldest arithmetic, in which the dive only counted because the pool went quiet, generalized for decades to a world in which the unwitnessed rep is the only one that grows the muscle; the weakness is not the polish; it is the polish's refusal to be a means.

Unspoken need: To be admired for the inside — the experience, once, of being seen and approved of in the unwashable, unphotographable middle: the tired version, the failed version, the version at the sink in the old shirt; and beneath it, the need the founding made unspeakable: to discover that worth survives the unflattering — that the crowd's applause was the first proof, not the only one, and that a person can be magnificent and mediocre-looking at it, on the same day, and remain the same person; the portrait, the book will show, was never the enemy; the portrait was the frame — and the frame, outgrown, becomes the place the Duelist serves from.

At a party: the room's featured guest or its quietest star — the Duelist arrives dressed half a degree above the dress code, moves through the crowd in arcs that cross the most sightlines, and tells the story that becomes the party's refrain; and the file's dry note: the type hosts even when not hosting — the bottle fetched, the shy guest drawn out with charm that looks like kindness and is also choreography; watch the moment the party thins: the Duelist leaves at the peak, on the laugh, before the room sees them tired — the portrait does not attend the cleanup.

In a new job: the immaculate debut — the first weeks are the mirror knight's native season: the Duelist learns the visible parts of the craft beautifully, presents with flair the seniors compliment for years, and is famous by month three; and the bout sheet's finding on the arc, uniform across the careers: the polish outruns the grit — the unglamorous middle of the job, the audit, the maintenance, the slow ugly build, is delegated, rescheduled, or styled until it disappears; and the promotion that requires a beginner's apprenticeship — the management track, the new discipline — is declined, politely, because the portrait does not wear the white belt.

Under sudden pressure: the flourish's finest hour — the crisis, the deadline, the stage: the Duelist blooms — the rhetoric rises, the jacket stays perfect, the problem is solved with a move someone will describe at dinner; and the bout sheet's careful correction: the crisis is safe — an emergency is a stage with stakes, and the Duelist has been rehearsing for stages since the recital; the pressure this type actually avoids is the slow, the unwitnessed, the ten-year grind with no ovation at any fixed point; the crash at 2 a.m. gets the best of them; the ordinary Wednesday does not.

In a conversation: the duelist at work — the listening is elegant, the questions are gifts, the anecdote arrives with three acts; and the file's entry: the conversation is a bout conducted with perfect manners — the Duelist must leave the exchange having landed the better line, the subtler point, the more gracious exit; watch the tell when someone else's story lands harder: the smile that holds its shape a half-second too long, and then — the file's signature finding — the improvised sequel later that night: the line the Duelist wished they had said, delivered to the bathroom mirror, flawlessly.

On holiday: the itinerary as photo shoot — the destination chosen partly by its light; the mornings scheduled around the golden hour; the restaurants researched to the signature dish; and the file's diagnostic: the Duelist does not exactly rest on holiday; the Duelist shoots the lifestyle — the type is both the traveler and the travel photographer of the traveler, and the album, on review, is the type's autobiography in one recurring subject; the file's dry note: the photographs are lovely; the file has never once seen a photograph of the Duelist asleep.

The Austere Duelist (V21) is the sibling, and the confusion is the file's first order of business: both spar daily, both pursue the perfected form, both are magnificent under pressure; but the Austere Duelist fences alone and for the form itself — the audience is welcome to leave; the mastery is the whole cargo; the Vain Duelist fences for the gallery — the form is the exhibit, the witness the co-signer, and the mastery incomplete until admired; the file's working distinction: the Austere Duelist practices the move ten thousand times in an empty hall; the Vain Duelist practices it ten thousand times in an empty hall and then checks whether anyone saw the last one; watch what each cannot do — the Austere cannot perform; the Vain cannot stop performing.

The Radiant Performer (V11) is the second confusion: both bloom in front of a crowd, both charm it, both leave it warmer; but the Performer's engine is the room's love — the applause is affection, and the Performer would rather be adored than ratified; the Duelist's engine is the portrait's excellence — the applause is verification, and the Duelist would rather be acknowledged as excellent than adored as lovable; the file's working distinction: the Performer asks the room "do you love me?"; the Duelist asks the room "did you see that?"; and the tell that settles any disputed diagnosis: after the show, the Performer wants the embrace; the Duelist wants the review.

And the signature bout sheet closes with the refined field check the dance card has waited the whole circuit to deploy, because the portrait defeats every ordinary instrument — the mirror knight reads as magnificent at first contact and as unwitnessed by the third act, and the seam in between has never been measured — and the refined check is run not at the flourish but at the empty room: watch what survives when the crowd goes home. the onlooker's log of a recorded affray: the mirror knight at thirty- eight, the excellence certified at three decades — the wardrobe, the form, the charm at ceiling — and the instrument is the ordinary audit, deliberately scribbled: the week's victories, choreographed twice — once witnessed, once not.

The witnessed column: the client won, the duel flawless, the room rearranged into an audience, the readings at ceiling, the flourish landing — and the empty-room column, run the same week: the quiet fix — the junior's broken build, repaired at 7 a.m., alone, perfect — scribbled in the bout sheet by the junior, not the mirror knight; the unglamorous save — the colleague's deadline, covered, unphotographed — and the dance card's key telltale flourish, the one the antechamber has waited the whole salon to log: the unwitnessed victories do not register. the rumor mill should mark it plainly: the mirror knight, asked at the week's end to inventory the week's wins, listed seven — every one witnessed — and the two empty-room saves, both objectively the week's best work, were not on the list, had never made the list, could not be recalled — and the readings, choreographed during the recollection attempt, dipped at the empty-room items like a display failing at a dead pixel — and the guests' exit interviews, the dance card's collected set, converge on the sentence the bout sheet has waited a generation to log: "the most brilliant person I know, and I once watched him fix the whole pipeline alone at dawn and he has never once mentioned it — but the tie he wore to the demo, three people have heard about."

And the check's one measurement, aimed past the flourish at the cost underneath: count the wins that required an audience. the dance card ran it across the galas: victories, in the scribbled decade — hundreds, certified; wins performed without sightlines — the quiet fixes, the unglamorous saves, choreographed at full excellence and filed as nothing — and the field check's one-line finding: the Duelist is the only constitution in the circuit whose scoreboard has a seating chart — the win, unwitnessed, does not count; the fix, unphotographed, does not exist — and the arithmetic, choreographed honestly, is the whole engine in miniature: the child learned that motion is beauty when watched; the adult runs the excellence at full strength and pays it out only in sightlines; and the best work of the mirror knight's whole career is sitting in an empty room, unclaimed, at 7 a.m. — because the portrait, the record certifies, cannot see it from the mirror.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io

Read the rest

THE VAIN DUELIST

The full book continues past this sample.

Get it here:
https://ko-fi.com/s/d1d0434afa

Pay what you want, S$1.90 or more. No account needed. Instant PDF + EPUB.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Aiman Sterling is the author of The Archetype Series -- a library of personality portraits drawn the way literature draws characters: the great types of human temperament, recognized at a glance, understood in depth, and followed from childhood wound to mature strength.