Introduction

The Quran contains more than eighty recorded duas -- the actual words spoken by prophets, believers, angels, and ordinary people in moments of need, hope, fear, gratitude, and surrender. These are not decorative phrases. They are the recorded conversations between creation and Creator, preserved in the exact words that were spoken, so that every generation after them can call with the same words, in the same manner, for the same reasons.

This book is a companion to Du'a: Supplication in the Quran (Lessons Book 13), which covers the framework -- the command to call, the promise of response, the conditions of acceptance, the etiquette. This book is the reference collection. Its purpose is practical: to gather the duas of the Quran, organize them by the needs they serve, and for each one give four things -- the words, the source, when to use it, and why it works.

The chapters follow the great human needs. Guidance. Knowledge. Provision and wealth. Debt and hardship. Protection and prevention. Forgiveness. Rescue from distress. Family and children. Parents. The Hereafter. Within each chapter, each dua is presented in the same format:

The Words -- a translation of the dua, faithful to the Arabic, with the key Arabic phrases preserved so the reader can recognize and recite them.

The Source -- the surah and verse, who spoke it, and the moment in which it was spoken. A dua detached from its story is half understood; the story is part of the power.

When to Use It -- the life situations in which this dua fits. The Quran's duas were revealed inside real human moments -- exile, poverty, infertility, illness, betrayal, temptation, grief -- and those moments repeat in every life.

Why It Works -- the reason this particular dua, in this particular wording, is effective. The duas of the Quran teach theology in miniature: who Allah is, what He controls, what He loves, and what He has promised. The one who understands why a dua is worded the way it is worded calls with certainty, not repetition.

Two principles govern this book. First, no fabrication: every dua printed here comes from the Quran itself. Where a beloved practice -- such as reciting the last two surahs for protection, or specific duas for debt -- comes from the Prophetic tradition rather than the Quran, the text says so plainly and cites the tradition as tradition. Second, no magic: the duas of the Quran are not incantations that compel. They are requests that align the caller with the One who alone gives, and the response -- promised in 40:60 -- comes in the time, the form, and the measure that the Giver knows to be best.

A note on the "purpose-made" duas. People ask: is there a dua for wealth? For preventing harm? For clearing debt? The answer is yes -- not because the Quran contains spells, but because the recorded words of the prophets cover the entire range of human need. Musa, destitute and exiled, prayed for provision (28:24) and was given work, family, and home within days. Ayyub, stripped of everything, prayed about his hardship and was restored (21:83-84). Nuh told his people that seeking forgiveness itself brings rain, wealth, and children (71:10-12). The Quran's map of dua covers money, health, fear, family, and the soul's final destination.

Read it once from beginning to end, and then keep it where you can reach it. The believer's life is a sequence of moments -- and for each moment, someone in the Quran has already shown what to say.

Chapter 1: The Foundation -- What Makes a Dua Work

Every dua in this book rests on two verses. The first is the command: "Call upon Me; I will respond to you" (40:60). The second is the nearness: "And when My servants ask you concerning Me -- indeed I am near. I respond to the call of the caller when he calls upon Me" (2:186). Notice what the second verse does not say. It does not say "I hear" or "I will consider." It says I am near -- present tense, continuous. The question is not whether the response comes; the Quran states it as fact. The only question is the form and the timing of the response.

These two verses are the foundation of every chapter that follows. A dua is not an attempt to get Allah's attention -- His attention never left. A dua is the act of a servant speaking to a Lord who commanded the speech and promised the answer. That is why the duas of the Quran are so calm. Musa fleeing Egypt does not babble; he says "My Lord, I am in need of whatever good You send upon me" (28:24) -- six words that contain an entire theology: Lord, need, goodness, and surrender.

The Arabic word dua (????) means a call, an invocation, a summons. Its root carries the sense of directing one's voice toward something. In the Quran's usage, a dua is the creature speaking to the Creator in the second person -- "Rabbi" (my Lord), "Rabbana" (our Lord) -- naming the need and naming the One who can meet it.

The Quran distinguishes dua from two things it is often confused with. First, dhikr -- remembrance, the repetition of Allah's names and praises, which is worship but not a request. Second, ruqya -- protective recitation, which the Quran also endorses ("We send down of the Quran that which is healing and mercy for the believers" -- 17:82), but which functions differently from a request. This book includes both: the requests (the vast majority) and the protective recitations, clearly labeled.

The duas of the Quran share a recognizable anatomy. Almost all begin by addressing Allah -- "Rabbi" or "Rabbana." Almost all name the need plainly. And the best of them close the loop of the relationship: they ask not only for the thing but for the Giver's continued presence -- "so count us among the righteous," "and admit us by Your mercy." A dua that asks only for the gift is commerce; a dua that asks for the Giver is worship.

Why does calling produce results? The Quran gives four answers, and each one appears in the chapters ahead.

First, because Allah promised. "Call upon Me; I will respond to you" (40:60). "I respond to the call of the caller when he calls upon Me" (2:186). "Is He who responds to the distressed when he calls upon Him and removes the evil... ?" (27:62). A promise from the One who never breaks a promise is certainty, not probability.

Second, because dua is the acknowledgment of tawhid -- oneness. The one who calls admits there is no power and no strength except Allah's. That acknowledgment is the truth of the universe, and the Quran teaches that aligning with truth has consequences: "Whoever fears Allah -- He will make for him a way out, and provide for him from where he does not expect" (65:2-3).

Third, because dua is itself the response. The Prophet's tradition, echoed in the Quran's logic of 2:186, holds that dua is worship -- the act draws the servant near, wipes away arrogance, and reorders the heart. Many a caller receives the thing asked for; every sincere caller receives the nearness. The nearness was the greater gift all along.

Fourth, because the duas of the Quran carry the barakah of the exact words used by those Allah approved. When a person calls with the words of Musa, Ayyub, Yunus, or Zakariya, they join a chain of accepted calls. These were not requests that bounced off the sky -- the Quran records what happened next: Musa was fed and housed, Ayyub was healed and restored, Yunus was delivered from three darknesses, Zakariya was given Yahya against all biology. Reciting their words is calling on the same Lord, with the same proven formulations, in the same spirit.

For each dua, the "when" describes the recurring human situations that match the original context -- because the Quran's contexts are the archetypes of human need. And the "why" explains the theology embedded in the wording -- because a dua understood is doubled in power compared to a dua merely repeated.

One caution frames the whole book. The Quran warns of the dua that is careless -- "neither living nor dead" hearts that call in distraction (8:24's language of response applies); and it warns of the dua that is presumptuous -- calling for what leads to ruin while assuming it is good: "Perhaps you hate a thing and it is good for you; perhaps you love a thing and it is bad for you. Allah knows, and you know not" (2:216). So the chapters ahead end where acceptance begins: with trust in the wisdom of the Responder over the impatience of the asker. The response always comes. It comes as the gift requested, or as a gift better, or as a deflection of a harm that would have ruined the asker -- the third form is invisible until, one day, it is seen.

With the foundation laid, the next chapters walk through the needs of a life, dua by dua: guidance, wealth, debt, protection, forgiveness, rescue, family, parents, and the Hereafter -- each with its words, its story, its moment, and its reason.
