Introduction

If the five pillars of islam are the building's visible frame, the six pillars of iman are the ground the whole house stands on. The framework again arrives from the tradition -- the second answer of the famous Jibril-visit (labeled as tradition throughout) -- but the Book itself recites the creed at its own stations: "righteousness is the one who believes in Allah and the Last Day and the angels and the Book and the prophets" (2:177); "the Messenger believes in what was sent down to him from his Lord, and the believers -- all believe in Allah and His angels and His books and His messengers" (2:285); "O you who believe, believe in Allah and His Messenger and the Book He sent down... and the angels" (4:136) -- the six articles in the Book's own repeated lists.

This book reads the six in twelve core chapters, extended by three closing-registers at the file's end: the framework's source (1), Allah (2), the angels (3), the books (4), the messengers (5), the Last Day (6), the decree (7), 4:136's double-believe (8), the word iman itself (9), the growth-file (10), the two words' relation (11), and ihsan -- the third level of the Jibril-visit's teaching -- as the summit (12).

And the book's own standing honesty at the door: the six articles are the world's most-recited creed -- but the Book defines the believing by its fruits (8:2-4), grows the faith at the recitation's own rain (9:124), and corrects the claim at the heart's own bar (49:14) -- and the reader who finishes these twelve chapters will hold the six both as the confessed list and as the living deposit the Book itself describes.

And the book's own final invitation at the shelf's own map: the six articles read here at the summary's own speed, and each article's own whole territory held across this project's companion shelves -- the Tawhid-book, the Unseen-shelf, the Prophets-shelf, the Hereafter-shelf -- the creed's one sentence opening the whole estate, and the reader walking the six as the six wings of the one library.

Chapter 1: The Framework's Source -- The Jibril-Visit's Second Answer

The tradition's famous visit (labeled as tradition) asked its three questions in order -- and the second answer defined the creed: "What is iman?" -- "that you believe in Allah, and His angels, and His books, and His messengers, and the Last Day, and that you believe in the decree -- the good of it and the hard of it." The six articles delivered in one sentence by the Prophet himself, in front of the companions, as the visitor examined them -- and the community received the framework as an event it could retell for as long as it would keep the creed.

The series' standing method holds the label honestly: the numbered six are the tradition's summary, not a single Quranic sentence -- but the summary's contents are all the Book's own articles, listed in the Book's own creedal verses (2:177, 2:285, 4:136), and the framework's authority is the tradition's own trusted files. The reader holds both facts at once: the six stand on the transmitted summary, and each article stands independently on the Quran's own text -- this book's twelve chapters show the six rising from the pages themselves.

The scene's order teaches before the contents do (the scholars' note on the Jibril-file, labeled): the islam-answer first (the five exterior pillars -- the previous book's subject), the iman-answer second (the six interior pillars -- this book's subject), and the ihsan-answer last (the summit -- this book's final chapter). The order's own logic: the exterior taught first as the building's visible frame, the interior second as the frame's own foundation, and the summit last as the whole house's own roof-garden -- the believer's whole religion held in the one scene's three answers, and the two companion books of this series holding the first two answers at the same method: the tradition labeled, and the Book keeping the first word.

The scene's own transmission deserves its own read (the scholars' note on the file's chain, labeled): the answers given publicly, the companions the witnesses, and the tradition itself carrying the scene as the religion's own classroom-record -- the framework not a scholar's later abstraction but the Prophet's own catechism, witnessed by the generation that built the community. And the witness-file's own yield for the modern believer: the six articles held at the same trust the five are held -- one scene, two answers, three levels -- and the two companion books of this series standing on the same record, at the same method: the tradition's summary read inside the Book's own texts, and the creed never a cold inheritance but a living dialogue the community itself attended.

And the framework's quiet-source completes the chapter (the Book's own lists read as the tradition's foundation): 2:285's own confession-file -- "the Messenger believes in what was sent down to him from his Lord, and the believers -- all believe in Allah and His angels and His books and His messengers; we make no distinction between any of His messengers" -- the six-articles' own congregational-recitation, held at the Book's own verse-voice, and the believer's own nightly-file at the prayer's own stations. And the quiet-source's yield: the tradition's numbered six never invented -- the Book itself already reciting the list at its own creedal stations (2:177, 2:285, 4:136), and the Jibril-scene's answer the Book's own list numbered for the classroom -- the summary holding the recitation, and the recitation holding the summary, and the six pillars standing on both ledgers at once.

And the framework's own final register held at the scene's own second answer: the six held at the teaching's own authority, and the twelve chapters as the answer's own full length.

And the chapter's own closing note held at the scene's own whole yield: two answers read, two books opened -- and the summit waiting at the final chapter, as the tradition's own third word: the excellence held at the Book's own confirming light.
