SAMPLE

The Rebuilt Survivor

The Personality That Refused to Die and Rebuilt Itself

Aiman Sterling

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Buy the full book:

Carousell

Ko-fi ko-fi.com/s/3d0a31b165

Contents

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Rebuilt Survivor at a Glance

Chapter 2: The Core — Refusal as Foundation

Chapter 3: The Instrument — The Rebuild

Chapter 4: The Craft — Function Restored Where the World Wrote "Ended"

Chapter 5: The Cost: Rest, Grief, the Admission

Chapter 6: The Dark Side: The Armor Defended as Finished

Chapter 8: The Rebuilt Survivor in Love and Friendship

Chapter 9: The Matchups — Companions, Rivals, and the Other Types

Chapter 10: From Machine to Person — the Survivor Who Consults What's Underneath

Afterword

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

You know this person, or you are this person. The rebuild log commences at its most indestructible exhibit, and the honesty it owes this breed comes first, because the world gets this one wrong in both directions — the colleague's entry, held with the awe the manila folder has learned to pay this constitution before it says anything else: the fire took half the building and she was back at her desk in nine days — I never once saw her cry, and I never once saw her late again — whatever happened in that hospital, she came out of it made of something the rest of us don't have — the invulnerability, worn as skin, and the room, leaning on it forever after.

The tourniquet's entry, noted down with the devotion and the one permanent question: he is the steadiest thing in my life — nothing rattles him, nothing is ever too heavy, and last month I realized I have never once seen him sit down and do nothing — and I have never once been told what's under it — I love a fortress and I have never met the tenant — the machine, magnificent, and the person, unconsulted. And the shock of the breed's true history, glimpsed by accident — the old friend's sentence, held with the tenderness of the one who was there in the wreckage: people meet her and think she was born level — she wasn't — I was there the year everything ended — the doctors said never, the forms said ended, the whole world wrote her off in triplicate — and she looked at all of it and said one word, no, and then she built herself back, part by part, and it took years — and I watched her schedule every hour of it except one thing — the crying — that was the one appointment she never booked, and it is still, twenty years later, on nobody's calendar — the refusal, mechanical and total, and the grief, still standing in the wreckage, in original packaging.

And the question the manila folder keeps beside the wreck report from the first page: is the rebuilt self the rebuild log's greatest survival or its most beautiful avoidance — the machine that outlived the ending, and the mourner who was never once let in?

This is a case file on the Rebuilt Survivor: the personality that refused to die and rebuilt itself.

The wreck day scene is the ending that was declined, and the manila folder marks what makes it the reader's only adult origin, and the adult-ness matters: the type was already a person — finished, functioning, ordinary — and the event, arriving in one stroke, ended that person by every written account: the physicians, gently; the adjusters, finally; the family, quietly — and the wreck day act was not hope, grit, or any word from a greeting card: it was the refusal — mechanical, absolute, almost administrative — the type's collected sentence, uniform in every case, delivered flat: no — the ending, declined like a bad invoice — and the refusal, acted on, became the build: the self, reassembled piece by piece, part by replaced part — triage, salvage, fabrication, integration — until the machine functioned — and the wreck day ruling, made in the wreckage, never once revised: function is the self — as long as it runs, I exist — and the wreck report summary's verification, run across every case since: the build worked — and the wreck file honors it: the greatest exhibits in this record are survivor builds — the walking that was never going to happen, walking; the life that was over, lived — the survivor did not invent the rebuild; the survivor is the understructure that specialized in it.

And the clause the ruling never carried, the clause that becomes the wreck report: the build had a scope, chosen honestly, in triage, by a person in extremis: everything that functions — and the scope excluded one item, never consciously: the grief — the mourning, unscheduled because mourning does not run a machine; the before-self, unconsulted because the before-self was the one who got wrecked — and the wreck report intake summary's founding paradox, stated plainly: the build that saved the life postponed the other survival — the loss, never felt, only worked around — and the type's own hungers, the manila folder has verified, meetable in the one room the build never opened: the drawer the person keeps the ordinary Tuesdays in — the coast, the music, the game, the whole client the machine was always for — and the ascension's whole discovery, arriving ten chapters early so the breed can practice standing in it: the person was never dead — the person was in the machine the whole time — the one who refused, the one who chose the next part, the one who wanted the function for a reason, and the reason, the whole file will show, is the wreck report's buried treasure: the build was always the person's — it was just never once billed to them.

If you are this breed, the book's wager is exact: you have already done the hardest thing in this catalog — declined an ending the whole world had signed — and the manila folder's question, held across ten chapters and asked flat-out here so you can try standing in it: what was the machine for? — because the wreck report summary's answer, in every case, is the reading the armor guards most carefully: there is a reason, and it is yours, and it is sitting under the plate with twenty years of unfiled requests — the coast, the joy, the ordinary Tuesday, the person the build was always for — and the asking, the rebuild log has verified, breaks nothing: the machine keeps running — the grief, scheduled, is finite; the grief, armored, is permanent — and the mourning was never going to end you; the ending was the event, and you already refused it.

If you love one, your working order is precise and counterintuitive: do not pity them — pity is the wreckage's verdict, and it gets deflected like weather — and do not become another client of the machine; the instruction that works, and the wreck report intake summary has tested it: ask about the tenant — the Stayer's twin lines, both true, in one breath: that's the build, and it's magnificent — now who were you, before it? — I'd like to meet them — and then hold the silence through the spec, and receive the first non-spec sentence like a birth — because the Rebuilt Survivor has spent a lifetime being trusted with everyone's load and never once asked what's under the plate, and the growth, the manila folder from first page to last will show, begins the first time someone rings the machine's doorbell and waits for the person to answer.

Turn the page. The Survivor is still out there — mid-maintenance, mid-load, the steadiest presence in every room they enter and the one resident never once consulted — and the wreck file's promise is the wreck report summary's plainest: the machine was never the enemy — the machine is the monument, and monuments are allowed to be visited — and the self, once the grief is scheduled and the client is interviewed and the joy is bought, becomes what it always appeared from the outside and never quite was: not a fortress — a home — the word's whole, old meaning: the build, kept; the door, opened; and the person, at last, living in it.

And the rebuild log opens on the survey the manila folder ran at the archive's end, held back until now because the finding reads as trivia until you hold it beside the intake: the plans — the folder asked each subject for the blueprint of the build, and the request, so simple, produced the breed's most telling artifact: every Survivor, without exception, could produce the rebuild plan — the phases, the budgets, the milestones, decades old, recited to the page — and not one subject, in the whole catalog, could produce a plan for anything after it — the follow-up question, asked once, is the folder's flattest exhibit: "'your rebuild is finished.

What is the next project?" — and the answers, uniform: the Survivor, pausing, the length of the pause itself the finding, and answering, every time, some version of "'I hadn't loaded anything there" — and the reader is asked to carry the blank page through everything that follows: the build was the whole architecture — not only of the self but of the self's future — and the machine, so magnificent, has been running for decades on the only project it was ever given, complete, with nothing in the queue — and the whole file will show what the survey already states: the question the breed was built to answer was "ended?" — and it answered it — and nobody, including the tenant, ever wrote the next one.

A note on the manila folder's sources, because this breed's testimony has a load-bearing quirk: the Survivor, asked about the self, answers with the repairs — so the folder's interviews were reconducted, wherever the wreck files allowed, around the one question the type deflects by reflex — and the finding, uniform across every session: the subject, asked "what happened," tells it plainly (the fire, the crash, the year in the chair, the numbers, the dates — the account flawless, as though recited from an inventory); asked "what was it like," goes silent — and the folder's stenographer, trained by the third session, began leaving the tape off — and the method note, pressed into the breed's opening: the quotations that follow were taken mostly from the others — the tourniquet, the colleague, the old friend — because the tenant's own voice, so loud on repairs, has never once, in any of these volumes, been caught on the tenancy itself — and the folder's one certified transcription of the question landing, kept whole: the friend, at the kitchen table, asking "what was it like," and the Survivor, after a full minute, answering: "which part" — and the friend, in the margin, writing: "he was not stalling. He was choosing. I have never found out between what."

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Rebuilt Survivor at a Glance

Before anything else, the reassuring — and the manila folder must open with the honest first impression, because this type is the only one in this catalog the room relaxes around for the wrong reason: the Rebuilt Survivor is the calmest, steadiest, most functional person in the room — the voice, level through the fire drill; the hands, correct through the emergency; the whole presence, load-bearing, like a wall you could lean on — and the effect on the audience is the wreck report intake summary's most unanimous: everyone is soothed — the anxious, the young, the frantic — the type's calm is the contagious kind — and only the observant half eventually notices the detail the wreck file has learned to check first: the calm has a temperature — it is not warm and it is not cold; it is rated — the calm of a machine that has already survived its worst day, and therefore cannot be impressed by this one — and the wreck report summary's collected sentence, uniform in every case, offered by the colleague who eventually places it: nothing rattles him — nothing — and someday you find out why, and then his calm makes perfect sense, and you can never un-know it — the invulnerability, earned, worn as skin — plate-metal calm, the wreck file's name for it — and the whole portrait lives under it.

And the posture carries the type's signature gesture, and the wreck report intake summary enters it precisely because it is the diagnostic: the inventory narration — the survivor, asked anything about the history, recites it clinically — the accident, the diagnosis, the fire, the war, told as procedure: dates like a logbook, treatments like a spec sheet, the losses, itemized like salvage — and the wreck file's x-ray of the narration: the story, perfectly preserved and perfectly unfelt — the events, kept at machine's length; the grief, nowhere in the account — and the tell within the tell, the one the rebuild log has verified in every case: the narration, always in second person by proxy — this happened, then this was done, then this was installed — the self, absent from its own story, exactly as the self is absent from the machine's spec sheet — and the wreck report summary's founding finding entered in the book's ink the whole book lives in: the survivor rebuilt everything — the body, the work, the life, piece by piece, part by replaced part — and stopped one item short: the person who lived through it — the machine, finished and running; the mourner, never once assembled — and everything this breed does is one skill: restoring function — with the second finding riding beside it, the one the wreck report from first page to last turns on: the build was magnificent — and the build, the manila folder from first page to last will show, was never the same thing as the healing.

The wreck file holds one origin for this breed, and it is the catalog's only founding scene that does not belong to childhood — and the wreck report intake summary must walk it slowly, because the scenario explains everything the world misreads as toughness, luck, or coldness: there was an ending — and it arrived in one event — the wreck report summary keeps the particulars various on purpose, because the anatomy is uniform: the accident, and the body, permanently altered in an afternoon; the diagnosis, and the life, rewritten between two appointments; the war, the fire, the collapse, the loss so total it took the world with it — the job, the marriage, the home, the health, ended in a single season — and the rebuild log marks what makes this founding scene unique on this shelf: the type had already been someone — a finished, functioning adult, with a self that worked — and the event, ending that self, left the type standing in the wreckage of a person — and the scene's first act, uniform without fail: the world wrote the ending — the physicians, gently: you'll never walk again; the adjusters, finally: the company is gone; the family, quietly: we don't expect her to be the same — and the scenario's second act, the one that founds the constitution: the refusal — and the rebuild log enters the refusal precisely: it was not hope, not defiance, not inspiration — the refusal was mechanical — the type's collected sentence, uniform in every case, delivered flat, decades later: I didn't accept it — there was nothing noble in it — I just wouldn't — the ending, declined like a bad quote — and the third act, the act that became the engine: the rebuild — the self, reassembled, piece by piece, part by replaced part — the walking, relearned, step by agonizing step; the trade, retrained; the home, re- founded; the person, rebuilt — until the machine ran — and the wreck day ruling, drafted in the debris and never re-read since: function is the self — as long as it runs, I exist — and the wreck file's paradox, entered without ornament: the rebuild saved the type's life in the plain sense — the wreck report intake summary has more than one case where the build was the only alternative to the grave — and the same ruling, the whole case will show, quietly postponed the other survival, the one nobody scheduled: the grief — the loss, never mourned, because the mourning was never in the build order.

And the wreck report summary must enter the scenario's clause with the care this wreck report demands, because the clause is where the gift turns into the wreck report: the rebuild worked — the machine runs, decades on, better than the originals — and the constitution learned one lesson from the entire event: endings can be declined — a true and mighty lesson — and the clause the constitution never wrote: not everything is a machine — some of what was lost was not function but feeling — the grief, the fear, the original self, the person who existed before the event and was never once consulted about the new one — and the wreck report intake summary's correction, held gently, because it is the wreck report's whole growth: the type was right that the world writes endings too early and too finally — and the type was wrong that the only answer to an ending is a build — the error understandable at the wreckage, quietly expensive at twenty years out, and the growth chapter's whole project: the person under the plate, at last, asked what they want — the machine, admitted as self, and the self, admitted as more.

The recovery album opens differently for this type, and the rebuild log enters the difference with the care it owes: for most of this catalog, the recovery album is the wreck day document; for the Rebuilt Survivor, the recovery album is the before — the photographs of the person who existed before the event, and the wreck file has learned to read them the way one reads a previous owner's manual. The early pages are the rebuild log's most poignant in the catalog: the child who would later be rebuilt, whole — the grin, unarmored; the body, original; the dreams, unrestated but visibly ordinary: the career, the family, the small future everyone is entitled to — and the manila folder's first entry beside the recovery album: the before self was not remarkable — and the type knows it, and the knowing is part of the wreck report: the survivor's nostalgia is not for glory; it is for normality — the taken-for-granted, the thing the event taught the type to never take for granted again — and the recovery album's most common image, the one the type keeps and the rebuild log has collected in every case: the last photograph before — the last ordinary day, unremarkable in every way, and treasured beyond every photograph since — the wreck file's line beside it: the type mourns an ordinary Tuesday more than most people mourn cathedrals.

And the recovery album has a second section, the one that makes this wreck report unique on the shelf: the build log — the wreck report summary has collected it in every case: the hospital-year photographs — the type, mid-rehab, working — the exercises, done; the walker, progressed to the cane; the first steps, filmed by someone weeping behind the camera — and the type's face, in every frame of the build log, the diagnostic the whole case: working — not brave, not hopeful, not broken — working — the face of a person at a lathe — and the wreck file's entry beside the log: the family filmed the miracle; the type was documenting the installation — the difference between the two archives, the whole case in one observation: the family's album of the recovery contains a mourner nowhere, because the type's build log contains a builder everywhere — and the recovery album's quietest line, verified in every case: the two sections never meet — the before-self, kept in one drawer; the built-self, kept in another — and the type, the rebuild log notes, has never once been asked — by anyone, including the type — what the before-self would say about the machine that replaced them.

And the recovery album closes on the closer this series always saves: the person already the survivor — the post-event life, organized as construction site: the routines, load-bearing; the disciplines, daily; the whole biography, readable as a build — the second trade, constructed; the second marriage, engineered; the second self, assembled — and the moment the rebuild became the identity: the wreck report intake summary's collected scene, uniform in every case: the survivor, years into the functioning machine, asked by a stranger — what do you do? — and answering, without a pause and without irony, the sentence the whole constitution lives in: I rebuild — the verb, promoted from activity to identity — and the wreck file's founding arithmetic beside the last photograph: the type built the catalog's most indestructible self on a foundation with an unexamined crack — the machine, magnificent, running — and the one question, never once asked: is anyone home in it?

Energy: immense, disciplined, and ring-fenced — the type runs on the build's schedule: the physio, the training, the maintenance — decades of it, unbroken — and the rebuild log's honest spec: the survivor's energy is the most reliable in this catalog, because it is not a mood; it is a grid — and the spec's fine print is the wreck report: the energy has no off — rest, declined as a category; the stillness, suspected — because the build was always against time, and the time, in the constitution's deep arithmetic, never actually ran out.

Ambition: function, achieved — and then function, achieved again — the type's ambition is not a summit; it is a standard: the life that works, the body that runs, the machine, maintained — and the rebuild log's dry note: the survivor's ambitions are all met — the only type on this shelf whose goals are reliably attained — and the cost inside the achievement: the ambition has no subject — the standard is met, and the meeting, as the folder's whole ledger attests, was never the same thing as the point.

Vanity structure: hidden and absolute — the mirror is no admirer of the self; the mirror is the inspector — the type's self-regard attaches to the spec: what still works, what was restored, what the machine can do — and the wreck file's x-ray: under the humility — and the type is genuinely humble about the ordeal — there is a small, sturdy pride of craftsmanship: the survivor believes, quietly, that the rebuild is the best work anyone has ever done on a person — and the wreck report summary's quiet note: the belief is half right — the workmanship is unmatched on this shelf — and the pride protects the product: the machine, defended as the self's finished form.

Loyalty: to the crew of the build — the type's loyalties are earned in the wreckage, never transferable: the physiotherapist, kept for twenty years; the friend who showed up in the hospital year, kept for life; the tourniquet who stayed through the build, owed beyond language — and the wreck report intake summary's sharp note: the loyalty's spine is shared labor — the type stays loyal to whoever worked beside the machine — and the type's one breach condition: pity — the loyal one who begins to look at the type with the world's sadness gets gently, permanently, edited out — the pity, read as a verdict on the machine.

Weakness: the unshared load — the Survivor's whole structure collapses at the sentence: let me help you — the offer, arriving, is processed as the machine's audit: the assistance, declined like a recall notice — and the anatomy of the collapse: the breed, weakened, concealing — the symptom, hidden; the collapse, managed privately; the wreck report summary's collected defense, uniform in every case: I've handled worse alone — the sentence that turns the isolation into a credential and makes the fragility unadmittable by definition.

Unspoken need: to be consulted — the one experience the understructure has priced out of the machine: the person under the plate, asked — not about the function, which is fine; about the want — what the survivor actually desires, now, beyond the maintenance schedule — and the wreck report intake summary's central line on the wreck report: the type will not say this need aloud, cannot say it plainly, because the saying would admit the machine was built around a vacancy, and the build was never supposed to have one — and the manila folder from first page to last will spend ten chapters walking toward the sentence: the person was never dead — the person was never asked.

At a party: the Survivor is the wall — the steadiest presence in the room, the level voice, the hands that fix the host's jammed door on the way past — and the wreck report summary's tell, sharper under observation: the type, asked how are you?, answers with the spec — good — training's going well — shoulder's at a hundred percent — the person, answered as a machine — and the party, soothed and slightly chilled, and the wreck file's dry line: everyone trusts the survivor with their emergencies and no one has ever thought to invite the survivor to anything unofficial.

In a new job: the Survivor is the quiet overperformer — the first weeks, unremarkable; and then the crisis, arriving, and the type, suddenly magnificent — the calm through the outage; the level voice through the collapse — and the office, discovering what it has: the one person who is better the worse it gets — and the rebuild log's tell: the type, praised for the crisis work, deflecting with the collected sentence: it's just a Tuesday to me — offered without bitterness, and meaning it, the worst day of the office being a genuinely ordinary item in the type's history — and the wreck file's line: the institution, from that day, quietly routes all its catastrophes through the survivor, and never once asks what that costs.

Under sudden pressure: the Survivor is home — the pressure, arriving, and the type, level, correct, fast — the rebuild log's honest due: under fire this constitution is the best in the catalog, and it is not close — and the hint, sharper under observation: the afterward — the crisis, gone, and the type, still running at full power with nowhere to put it — the adrenaline, worked off alone; the debrief, declined; the wreck report intake summary's most telling detail, uniform in every case: the type, after saving the day, cleans — the room, the equipment, the site — the hands, needing the machine's rhythm back, and the wreck file's dry note: the survivor survives everything and cannot sit down in front of a witness.

In a boring meeting: the Survivor is elsewhere, visibly — the agenda, endured; the type's hands, quiet but occupied — the checklist, mentally drafted; the weekend's build, mentally scheduled — and the wreck report summary's tell, the one managers report in every case: this breed, asked for input on morale, offers instead a process improvement — the feeling-question, converted to a function-answer, every time — and the meeting, slightly baffled, and the wreck file's line: ask the survivor about the machine and you'll get an excellent answer; ask the survivor about the person and you'll get a spec.

On holiday: the Survivor suffers the unstructured week — the resort, arriving, and the constitution, by day two, building anyway: the itinerary, engineered; the trails, summited; the vacation, maintained like a facility — and the rebuild log's sharpest tell: the rest, attempted and failed — the type, horizontal on the beach by official decree, working through the rehab routine by reflex — and the wreck file's dry line: the survivor takes holidays the way the machine takes maintenance — scheduled, monitored, and never trusted.

The nearest neighbor on the shelf is the Comeback Athlete (Volume 27) — the personality that turns injury into fuel — and the confusion is the world's most understandable, because both types were ended by an event, both refused the ending, and both rebuilt in public view. The separation is what the rebuild is for: the Athlete rebuilds toward the game — the rebuild log, the podium, the return: overcoming as narrative, the comeback staged for the crowd that watched the fall; the Survivor rebuilds toward the life — function, restored; the game, over; the stands, empty and irrelevant: the build conducted for the self, not the scoreboard — and the test, the wreck report intake summary's cleanest, run at the finished build: watch each type when the original arena closes forever.

The Athlete, if the sport is truly gone, grieves it — loudly, publicly, on schedule

— the mourning is part of the comeback genre. The Survivor, in the same position, reassigns — the arena, closed; the build, aimed at the next function — the mourning, nowhere, because the build order never included it — and the rebuild log's hinge, entered dry: the athlete turns injury into fuel and tells the story; the survivor turns ending into machine and tells the specs — and the world, confusing them, sends the survivor to the comeback genre, where the survivor quietly declines the podium and goes home to do the maintenance.

The second neighbor is the Dark Virtuoso (Volume 83) — the personality that makes art from pain — and the confusion lives in the shared conversion: both types were destroyed by an event, both refused to waste the wreckage, both built their post-event selves out of the material. The separation is the medium: the Virtuoso converts destruction into feeling — the wound, shaped into form, the art, held open so the meaning stays alive; the Survivor converts destruction into function — the wound, shaped into machine, the art, declined because meaning is not on the build order — and the test, run at the finished work: watch what the conversion is for. The Virtuoso's build exists to be felt — the audience is supposed to hurt with it.

The Survivor's build exists to run — the audience is supposed to lean on it — and the rebuild log's hinge: the virtuoso lives in the wound's meaning; the survivor lives in the wound's repair — and the two of them, made from the same wreckage, cannot even discuss it in the same language — which is why the world, confusing them, asks the survivor to talk about it and asks the virtuoso to fix it, and both, in the wreck file's experience, quietly leave the room.

The third neighbor is the Relentless Avenger (Volume 9) — the personality that lives to overcome — and the confusion is the deepest, because both types were rebuilt by catastrophe around a mission: the wreckage, converted into the self's assignment; the loss, made into a purpose. The separation is the address of the build: the Avenger rebuilds outward — the cause, identified; the war, declared; the never-again contract, aimed at the world that did the damage; the Survivor rebuilds inward — the cause, irrelevant; the war, declined; the build, aimed entirely at the machine — and the test, the wreck report summary's most decisive, run at the person responsible for the event: the drunk driver, the negligent company, the arsonist.

The Avenger, oriented: the court, the campaign, the decades of pursuing. The Survivor, not even looking — the wreck report intake summary's collected finding, uniform in every case: the type, asked about the perpetrator, delivering the wreck report's most chilling calm: I don't think about them — the machine doesn't have a setting for that — and the wreck report summary's hinge, entered with the evenness both are owed: the avenger rebuilt the self around a war; the survivor rebuilt the self around a workshop — the same catastrophe raised one person to fight the ending and one to decline it, and the whole difference between them is which direction the wreckage was pointed — which is why the ascension path for one is the laying-down of the arms and, for the other, the opening of the workshop door.

The signature the workplaces keep retelling, opened first because it prices the whole machine: the nine-day return — the Survivor, wrecked, back at the desk before the sympathy cards arrive — and the rebuild log's evidence, uniform across the breed: the hospital bed, converted to a workstation (the folder's flattest exhibit: the code review, submitted from the ICU, on day four — the badge, logged in and out of the oncology ward like a gym); the grief, scheduled (the funeral, attended; the shiva, skipped; the Monday, worked) — and the signature's mechanism, which the chapter must state as the foundation's first law: the return is not denial — it is load transfer: the self, in crisis, moves its weight onto the one structure that never failed it, the work — and the finding beneath the machine, entered with the honesty the breed is owed: the nine-day return, so admired by every employer in these files, is the survivorship's most expensive habit — the rebuild log's arithmetic: the cost of the wreck, unpaid at the time, is carried forward — on the books, at full weight, for decades — the signature's closing line: the desk, so solid, was never a recovery — it was a ledger, and the grief was the debt.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io

Read the rest

THE REBUILT SURVIVOR

The full book continues past this sample.

Get it here:
https://ko-fi.com/s/3d0a31b165

Pay what you want, S$1.90 or more. No account needed. Instant PDF + EPUB.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Aiman Sterling is the author of The Archetype Series -- a library of personality portraits drawn the way literature draws characters: the great types of human temperament, recognized at a glance, understood in depth, and followed from childhood wound to mature strength.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Aiman Sterling is the author of The Archetype Series -- a library of personality portraits drawn the way literature draws characters: the great types of human temperament, recognized at a glance, understood in depth, and followed from childhood wound to mature strength.