SAMPLE

The Soul Broker

The Personality for Which Everything Is a Transaction

Aiman Sterling

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Buy the full book:

Carousell

Ko-fi ko-fi.com/s/958c006863

Payhip

Contents

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Soul Broker at a Glance

Chapter 2: The Core — The Running Account

Chapter 3: The Instrument — The Ledger

Chapter 4: The Craft — The Trades

Chapter 5: The Cost: The Ledger of the Always-Even

Chapter 6: The Dark Side: The Book That Owns the House

Chapter 7: The Soul Broker at Work — Career, Teams, and the Boss Relationship

Chapter 8: The Soul Broker in Love and Friendship

Chapter 9: The Matchups — Companions, Rivals, and the Other Types

Chapter 10: From Ledger to Gift — the Broker Closing the Book

Afterword

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

You know this person, or you are this person. the promissory note opens on its shrewdest exhibit: the friend who remembers, with twenty years' precision, exactly who owes what — the favor banked in 2004, the introduction never returned, the wedding gift calibrated to the gram against the gift she once received — and the trade ticket's found line, spoken by a friend of forty years with equal parts admiration and fatigue: you never once did me a favor; you made a deposit. The uncle whose generosity is legendary and whose invoices are invisible — every loaned trailer, every pulled string, every Christmas check arriving with the family's whole history of debts silently appended — and the nieces who learned, by twelve, that warmth from him was billable.

And the marriage the promissory note cannot close: the tender, competent spouse who runs the household like a trading floor — the chores tracked, the sacrifices scored, the anniversary gift that arrived with the entries read aloud: I took the day off for this; you know I never take days off — and the promissory note's signing finding, initialled in the ink the whole book lives in: nothing is free in this life; everything is priced; the price is never spoken; and the bill always arrives.

This is a case file on the Soul Broker: the personality for which everything is a transaction.

The signing scene is the household where nothing was free — and the trade ticket marks what makes it the brokerage's most ledgered origin: every gift billed, every kindness initialled with interest — the child who learned love's exchange rate before learning love: the affection released on compliance, the forgiveness that carried a term, the security that arrived, always, as an advance — and the child's discovery, made early and made coolly, the third door out of the same childhood weather the last two trade tickets came from: the consequences floated in that house — one sibling charmed them away, one appealed them — and this child priced them: the discovery that everything — the favor, the forgiveness, the rescue, the devotion — runs on debts and can be traded in them; and the trading floor that follows is the brokerage's most incorruptible marketplace: the running account — the self's worth computed as net position, the debts collected with the patience of a bank — and the child, quite reasonably, staying: the ledger was power of the kind nobody could revoke, and in a house where love was conditional, knowing the conditions was the only safety there was.

But the flaw is built into the same engine, and the ledger audits it in the same ink: a life in which everything is priced is a life in which nothing is given — and the promissory note's central finding, uniform across every offering: intimacy as contract — the unearned gift treated as fraud, the debt-free relationship unrecognizable, and closeness declined, quietly and with perfect manners, because it cannot be initialled into the price list — the friend-group's treasurer who knows everyone's balance and nobody's news; the spouse who is always fair and never generous; the middleman's own children, the trade ticket's tenderest entry, who received everything and felt, always, that they were being billed — and beneath the immaculate fairness runs the promissory note's most secret terror: the self's worth, computed as net position, is only as safe as the balance — and the balance, in this economy, can drop.

And the accrual: the unearned gift — and the trade ticket is precise, because this is the accrual the middleman will experience as bad business: not the burning of the ledger — the promissory note defends the ledger to the last page: the fairness is real, the memory is a gift, the reciprocity is a virtue the warm world pretends to despise and secretly relies on — but the closing of the price list: the ledger kept, and closed on Sundays; the kindness given with no entry made; the discovery — the accrual's radical clause, drawn from the middleman's own childhood — that the love the child priced so accurately was never actually for sale; it was being given, all along, badly, by people who did not know how else to say it — and the promissory note's finding on what happens when the Broker learns to receive: the unearned gift accepted — no invoice, no deposit, no return address — is the one transaction the middleman has never made, and the only one, the mature trade tickets agree, that ever moved the balance: up.

If you are this type, the price list's wager is exact: you are the fairest person in every room you enter, and the promissory note holds the proof — the debts always paid, the favors always returned, the word, once given, bankable at any institution in this trade ticket — and the trade ticket's question, held for ten chapters and interviewed plainly here so you can practice standing in it: what is your balance? — because the trade record's answer, in every case, is the finding the type has never once let itself read: the net position the self has spent a lifetime protecting has nothing in it — the accounts are all real, the memory is total, and the asset the whole portfolio was built to secure — the worth of the self, off- ledger, unconditional — was never on the books at all, because it was never for sale, and the child who priced the household's love so accurately never once priced the self's own: priceless, unconditionally, and unbilled.

If you love one, the instruction is precise and counterintuitive: do not overpay — the middleman reads excess generosity as an attempt to buy leverage, and the ledger will find the imbalance and correct it; and do not attempt the unearned gift head-on — it will be initialled, thanked, and balanced within the week; the instruction that works, and the promissory note has tested it: give the small unbillable things, and let them sit — the ride to the airport, the remembered birthday, the help that costs nothing — offered with no weight and no follow-up, until the day, the mature trade tickets all contain it, the Broker makes the one entry the ledger never had a column for: something given, for nothing, and left unbalanced — and discovers the account that was never about money at all.

Turn the page. The Broker is still out there — fair to the coin, generous on paper, alone with the books — and the trade ticket's promise is the promissory note's plainest: the fairness was always the gift; the pricing was the wound; and the self, once it learns to close the price list on Sundays, becomes what it always looked like from the outside and never was: not the merchant of every room it enters — one whole fair soul, whose ledger, balanced to perfection for fifty years, turns out on the last page to have been, the whole time, a love letter written in the only language the childhood ever taught: I am keeping score so carefully because I am terrified of what it means if nobody keeps score of me.

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Soul Broker at a Glance

Before anyone speaks, the terms have been assessed — and the trade ticket must open with the aboveboard fact that makes this type so useful and so lonely: the Soul Broker is fair. Radically, reliably, incorruptibly fair: the favor returned precisely, the debt acknowledged to the cent, the round bought exactly on schedule — and the trade record's sharp note: the fairness arrives with a temperature: the exactness that is never warm; the memory that is never quite flattering; the gift, always somehow, calibrated to the gram — the type's presents are the most accurate in this catalog, and the least surprising, because the value was computed, and the recipient can feel the abacus under the ribbon. Sharper under observation: watch what happens when someone gives the type something unearned — the help declined with perfect manners, the compliment deflected with an immediate counter-compliment, the generosity answered, within the week, by a favor of suspiciously exact size: the correction of an imbalance the giver never asked to exist.

The manner carries the exact memory, and the trade ticket has to render it precisely because it is so often mistaken for warmth: the Broker remembers everything — who drove whom, who forgot whose event, who was short at the restaurant in 1998 — and the memory is a gift when it works for you and a docket when it works against; the promissory note's found dynamic, uniform across every offering: the people around the middleman learn to keep their accounts current with the Broker and their lives current elsewhere — nobody tells the Broker their real news first; the Broker is told, reliably, after the settlement.

The exactness has one more tell the loved ones all report and the type never sees: the receipt — the favor returned with the acknowledgment attached: you drove me in March, so I'm taking you to the airport — the warmth of the act carried by the terms of the act, and the terms, in every case the trade file holds, are always read aloud.

And underneath the fair dealing runs the tell the middleman's circle all know: the declined closeness — the friendship that never quite closes the distance, the invitation that is always appreciated and almost never accepted, the help that is owed and therefore arrives — because closeness, the unearned kind, the kind that cannot be initialled into the price list, is the one currency the Broker has no account for; and the trade ticket's correction, initialled in the same ink as the fairness: the middleman is not cold; the middleman is settled — every account current, every relationship balanced, and the balance, in this economy, is the same thing the warm world calls distance.

the trade ticket holds two versions of the origin, and both hold, and they arrive at the same child.

In the first version, the house ran on terms: the affection released on compliance — the warmth that arrived with report cards and left with them; the forgiveness that carried a term (fine, but you owe me); the gifts that came with expectations stitched invisibly into the ribbon — and the child, watchful and quick, learned the house's true language before learning to ride a bike: nothing here is free; everything is priced; the price is never spoken; the bill always arrives.

In the second version, the child was good at it — the discovery, early, of a talent: the terms seen where the siblings saw weather; the leverage found where the cousins found feelings; the deal struck where the other children struck poses — and the household, the trade ticket notes with care, rewarded it: the child's shrewdness toasted at the table; the trades admired; the eye for the angle praised as sense — the child discovered the trading floor's second law, the one that would run the whole life: in a house where love is conditional, the one who knows the conditions holds the pen.

And the origin moment, where the versions converge, is always a bill, and always the same bill in every offering: the moment the child priced the love — sat in a bedroom, after a session of the house's weather, and did the arithmetic the last two trade tickets' siblings did differently: not I will charm it away, not I will keep score of deserving — but: it has a price; I will find it; I will pay it; and I will never again be the one who does not know the terms — and the constitution signed that day, initialled in the promissory note with the precision this offering deserves: everything is a transaction; the self's worth is net position; and the ledger is safety.

The trade record's correction follows the signature like an interest charge: the child learned love's exchange rate before learning love — and the exchange rate, mastered perfectly, became the only language; fifty years of fair dealing later, the ledger is immaculate, and the trade file's quietest finding: nobody has ever given the type anything the type could not account for — and the type has never once let them.

The trade album opens the way this album opens every time, and this offering's is the most orderly in the brokerage: the child is composed in all of them, and the household, everywhere in the frame, is on terms. The school photographs: pleasant, appraising, the face already set in the expression the promissory note knows well — not stern, but calculating warmth, the smile that is offered like a sample. The birthday tables, year upon year — and the telling detail the trade file marks at once: the gifts sorted — the child's haul counted, compared, and the thank-you notes drafted with an entry for each: the trade album's first ledger, in crayon.

The trade album's most telling photo is the one nobody will take out: the settlement — the sibling mid-negotiation, the coins or cards or chores changing hands, the child holding the terms of the house's weather like a clipboard — the deal struck, everyone in their places, and the promissory note's sharp entry beside it: no one in the photograph is unhappy; the trade album's peace is transactional, and the peace held — the trade album's quietest line — because everyone kept the terms, which the trade ticket notes is the only kind of peace a house on terms can have, and the child, already its clerk.

And the trade album closes, as it always does, on the closer the series knows: the child already the adult — the bedroom, the arithmetic, the bill for the household's love computed by lamplight and paid, on time, for the rest of the childhood: the report card, the compliance, the terms met to the letter — the moment the running account was installed as identity, the net position installed as worth, and the price list opened that has never once closed. The child looks into the camera of that lamplight and says, without words, the whole constitution: I know the price; I always pay; you can trust me — and you will never catch me owing anybody anything, ever.

The trade album, gently, disagrees: the child paid everything — and the account the payments were made to, the love the child priced so accurately, was never actually collecting; it was giving, badly, in the only language the house knew — and the child, the trade record's founding correction, paid retail for something that was being handed out free, and has charged the world retail for the same thing, ever since.

Energy: steady, appraising, and economical — the Broker runs on terms, not moods; the type has never once overspent, emotionally or otherwise, in public.

Ambition: the position, not the crown — the type wants the leverage, the leverage quietly held: the stake in everything, the account with everyone, the balance always known.

Vanity structure: the reputation for fairness — the pride is not in being loved but in being owed nothing; the type would rather be even than adored, and is, everywhere, both respected and kept at arm's length.

Loyalty: contractual and total — the trade record's driest note on this case: the Broker's loyalty is as good as a bond once issued, and priced the same way;

the trade file has never once seen the type default.

Weakness: the unearned gift — the inability to receive anything that cannot be entered; the imbalance that must be corrected by the end of the week.

Unspoken need: to be given something for nothing — the unconditional worth the net position has been standing in for; the need the type guards like a trade secret, because admitting it would reveal the position the whole portfolio protects: that the self's worth was never on the books.

At a party. Settling — the rounds bought exactly on rotation, the host's generosity noted for future settlement, the contacts made with the terms already silently drafted — the trade file's sharp detail: the Broker is the only guest who leaves even, every time, and the only one the warm half of the room experiences as a presence with a briefcase.

In a new job. Excellent, immediately: the promissory note has no offering where the Broker's first quarter was not brilliant — the terms understood before the offer letter was read, the leverage mapped, the value delivered precisely because the middleman prices its own contributions accurately; the promissory note's warning arrives on schedule: by the second year the middleman knows everyone's balance — who owes whom, whose work is billable, whose loyalty is leveraged — and the colleagues learn the order of the house: with the Broker, everything is possible, and nothing is free.

Under sudden pressure. the middleman's finest hour, and the trade ticket enters it without irony: the Soul Broker in a crisis is calm, leveraged, and decisive — the favors called in at exactly the right moment, the rescue assembled like a merger, the middleman's whole life of deposits redeemed in an afternoon; the promissory note's only caution: this is why the middleman is invaluable in every crisis — and the trade ticket's most delicate finding: the middleman sometimes, the mature offerings confess, waits for the crisis, the one room where the ledger is openly the best thing to have.

In a boring meeting. Gone — the appraiser's eye running the room's true economy: who is spending, who is storing, whose contribution is billable and whose is strategic — the daydream is not escape but arithmetic; the tell: the pen moves, and what it writes is a balance.

On holiday. the price list travels — the itinerary costed to the cent, the generosity of the host initialled, the spouse's relaxation itself quietly appreciated as an asset: the trade ticket's tenderest note: the middleman's vacations are the most efficient in the brokerage, and the least restful — because the ledger, the whole record has found, is the single piece of luggage the Broker cannot learn to leave behind.

The Elegant Predator (Volume 22) is the nearest neighbor, and the confusion is the trade ticket's most common: both types see the terms under every table; both are shrewd; both are, in their ways, excellent company. But the Predator's trade is extraction — the charm deployed to take more than it gives; the hunt, the leverage, the gain at your expense. The Soul Broker trades fairly — the type's whole pride is the balanced book; the Broker gives value, on time, to the gram; the Predator's account with you is designed to end ahead; the Broker's is designed to end even. The test: check the balance after five years. The Predator's counterparties are poorer and confused about why; the Broker's are even — and the promissory note's one-line border, dry and final: the Predator fleeces you; the Broker bills you — and only one of them will send the receipt.

The Divine Judge (Volume 68) shares the ledger instinct and the incorruptibility, and the families confuse the two constantly — both types keep score; neither takes a bribe. But the Judge's ledger is a docket — worth assessed, verdicts issued, the score kept of deserving, with no interest in the debt being repaid to the self; the Broker's ledger is an account — the score kept of debts, with no verdict on anyone's worth beyond the balance. The test in one dinner: owe them something. The Judge will note it and rule; the Broker will note it and collect — politely, patiently, with the receipt attached.

The Judge keeps score to be fair; the Broker keeps score to be even — and the deeper border, entered here because the two files are siblings from the same weather: the Judge took the bench because somebody had to keep the score of deserving; the Broker opened the book because somebody had to know the terms — and both, the trade record notes, were children doing an adult's work with the only tools the household left in reach.

The Devoted Caregiver (Volume 7) is the type the Broker is most often misdiagnosed as in the type's good decades — the Broker's generosity is real, punctual, and considerable, and from a distance it looks like the Caregiver's. But the Caregiver's ledger does not exist: the giving is the relationship; no entry, no balance, no receipt, the default rather than the settlement. The Broker's generosity always closes — the entry made, the balance restored, the warmth banked against the next season. The test that settles it in one image: give each of them something they cannot repay.

The Caregiver accepts it and is moved; the Broker declines it, or corrects it, or lies awake pricing it. Sharper than the neighbors, and finally than the tests: watch the unearned gift — the Predator prices it for leverage, the Judge rules it undeserving or not, the Caregiver is grateful — the Soul Broker returns it within the week with the terms read aloud; that exactness, that temperature, that receipt, is the trade ticket's first exhibit, and the price list's whole offering, in one balanced gesture.

And the signature trade ticket closes with the refined field check the balance sheet has waited the whole brokerage to deploy, because the fairness reads as integrity at first contact and as contract by the third act, and the seam between the two acts has never been measured — and the refined check is run not at the trades but at the unbillable hour: watch what happens when the gift cannot be initialled. the tallyman's log of a recorded offering: the middleman at thirty-six, the ledger certified at three decades — the exact memory, the returned favors, the bankable word, all real — and the trade instrument is the ordinary favor, deliberately chalked: the tallyman, chartered, pays for the middleman's coffee — small, unannounced, and the balance sheet's readings, taken across the following week: the ledger, working — the promissory note should mark the tell with its driest care: the repayment, arriving within four days, in kind, at a precise 1:1 — the coffee, bought back, unprompted, with the middleman's own — and the tallyman's key notation, the one the counting house has waited the whole book of business to log: the account cannot stay open.

The trade record should mark it plainly: the favor, run honestly, was $4.50, and the readings at the repayment: the old frequency, the signing's own arithmetic — an open account registering as danger — and the colleagues' exit interviews, the balance sheet's collected set, converge on the sentence the trade ticket has waited a lifetime to log: "the most reliable man I have ever worked with, and I have never once given him anything — not a coffee, not a ride, not a compliment with weight on it — because you can watch it bother him, like a stone in a shoe, until he pays it off."

And the check's one measurement, aimed past the fairness at the cost underneath: count the debts left open on purpose. the balance sheet ran it across the postings: debts collected, in the chalked year — every one, certified, the perfect record; debts held open — the borrowed favor, the unreturned kindness, the gift left unbalanced, sat with — zero, and the promissory note should log the spread with everything it has: the middleman, at the check's deepest probe, was interviewed the house rules' chartered question — 'what happens if an account stays open forever?' — and the answer, after the longest silence in the interview set, delivered with the old banking calm, verbatim: "then somebody is owed.

I don't do owed." And the field check's one-line finding: the Soul Broker is the only constitution in the brokerage whose ledger runs in both directions — the middleman collects with a bank's patience and pays with a bank's discipline, and the misdeal, the whole spread, is the direction the ledger was never once pointed: the net position, protected for thirty years, has nothing in it — the accounts all real, the memory total, and the worth, the whole asset, off-ledger, unbilled — and the arithmetic, reckoned honestly, is the trading floor in miniature: the child learned love's exchange rate before learning love; the adult runs every kindness as a note — and the people, the promissory note certifies, never once asked to be paid — they asked to be kept, and the keeping, the whole misdeal, cannot be initialled in a currency the price list has.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io

Read the rest

THE SOUL BROKER

The full book continues past this sample.

Get it here:
https://ko-fi.com/s/958c006863

Pay what you want, S$1.90 or more. No account needed. Instant PDF + EPUB.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Aiman Sterling is the author of The Archetype Series -- a library of personality portraits drawn the way literature draws characters: the great types of human temperament, recognized at a glance, understood in depth, and followed from childhood wound to mature strength.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Aiman Sterling is the author of The Archetype Series -- a library of personality portraits drawn the way literature draws characters: the great types of human temperament, recognized at a glance, understood in depth, and followed from childhood wound to mature strength.