SAMPLE

The Guardian's Shadow: Hantu Tetek

The Breast Ghost — The Maternal Body, the Night's Warder, and the Village's Oldest Guardian

Aiden Nightfall

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Buy the full book:

Gumroad

Contents

Introduction

Chapter 1: What Is Hantu Tetek? The Breast Ghost of Malay Folklore Explained

Chapter 2: The Origins and History of the Breast Ghost

Chapter 3: The Body of the Ghost — An Anatomy of the Inverted Maternal

Chapter 4: The Powers and Abilities of the Breast Ghost

Chapter 6: How to Protect Yourself From the Breast Ghost

Chapter 7: The Breast Ghost in Modern Media and Culture

Chapter 8: The Moral Lessons of the Breast Ghost

Chapter 9: Separating Fact from Fiction: The Science of the Breast Ghost

Glossary

References

The Guardian's Shadow

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

There is a question that surfaces in Singapore every Hungry Ghost season, usually typed at 2am into a forum by someone who grew up hearing about her: why is the Hantu Tetek so scary ah? And then, because everyone knows the answer, the thread fills with jokes — the titty spirit, the buxom banshee, the double-D demon — until someone types the actual memory underneath the laughter: the aunt who swore her cousin's friend was smothered by her in the kampong, and the grandmother who said it plainly. She presses you to her chest and you do not come back.

The Hantu Tetek — "breast ghost" in Malay — is a woman's ghost defined by her enormous, pendulous breasts. She roams the forest edges and the village's dark lanes at night, and her lore is a single, consistent sentence: she takes those who should not be there. Naughty children who stray past the tree-line. Young men who wander where they were warned not to go. The unwary, the out-too-late, the disobedient. She presses them into her chest until they stop; in the gentler tellings she carries them away and feeds them at her breast until they forget their real mothers' faces. Either way, the village gets its children home at dusk, and it gets them home every single night, which is the point, and always was.

This volume is the series' namesake. Of every being in The Guardian's Shadow's catalogue — the vampires of the birth-death, the familiars, the earth-gods, the water's residents, the oily man — the Hantu Tetek is the only one whose function is the title of the series: she is a guardian. A grotesque one, an embarrassing one, a figure the modern internet has laughed into harmlessness — but a guardian with a spotless service record. The forest is dangerous at night. Children get lost. Young men get into trouble at the village's edges. And for generations, the fence at the edge of all that danger was a story about a woman with enormous breasts who would smother you if you went to see.

Over the next ten chapters, this book follows the breast ghost from the maternal world that made her — the midwives, the nursing rites, the milk-miracles, and the saint of Perak who bore the name Long Breasts — through her body, her powers, her disciplinary career in the kampung and the modern city-state, her afterlife in memes and Melaka's ritual puppets, and the hard, practical science of what she has actually been doing all these years. The Hantu Tetek is the tradition's most honest monster. She never pretended to be anything but a mother working the night shift.

She crosses the strait, too, which matters: this is a figure of both shores — the Singapore kampong and the Malaysian kampung kept the same warning in the same words, and the modern city-state's children know her from forum threads the way their grandmothers knew her from the doorway. She is one of the small handful of beings — with the pocong, the pontianak, and the toyol — that make up the shared ghost-curriculum of the region, and her slot in that curriculum is unlike any other's. The others are feared. She is deployed.

Chapter 1: What Is Hantu Tetek? The Breast Ghost of Malay Folklore Explained

The Hantu Tetek is a female ghost whose defining feature is in her name: tetek is the Malay word for breast, and the ghost is her breasts — enormous, pendulous, sometimes described as reaching her knees, in the strangest variant growing from her back. She is a woman's shape built around an exaggerated maternal body, and everything else about her follows from it: she roams at night, at the edges — the forest, the kampung's dark lanes, the places children are told not to go — and she takes people. The standard lore is explicit about the method: she smothers her victims, pressing them into her massive chest until they suffocate. The standard lore is equally explicit about the targets: the naughty children who stray, the young men who wander, the ones the village warned.

In her gentler, eerier tellings she does not kill at all. She steals — carries the lost child into the forest and nurses it at her impossible breast, and the child feeds and feeds and slowly forgets its real mother, its home, its name. This is the version the tellings save for the deepest dread: not death but replacement. The Hantu Tetek's is the only lap in the catalogue from which you can be recovered alive but not entirely yours.

Sorting her from the catalogue's other women is the essential first task, because the Malay-Indonesian night is crowded with maternal horror. She is not the langsuir or the pontianak of Volumes 1 to 3 — those are death- origin vampires, women made monstrous by dying in childbed, whose long nails and green robes and neck-holes this series has already walked through. The Hantu Tetek carries no death-story in most tellings: nobody tells you how she died, because the tradition does not think of her as a dead woman at all. She is a function wearing a woman's body — the way the jembalang of Volume 10 is a function wearing the ground's body. She is not a familiar, not a spirit of place in the strict sense, not a pocong of the shroud. She is the night's warder: the maternal body posted at the boundary, and the tradition built her the way one builds any boundary- marker — big enough to see in the dark.

And the name deserves its own note, because it is two-thirds of the figure. Hantu tetek is, plainly, "breast ghost" — and the plainness is the embarrassment that made the modern internet file her under comedy. But read the name as the tradition built it: of all the ghost's body, the tradition named her for the nursing organ — not the claws, the mouth, the grave-clothes. The name says what she is for. The breast is the first face a human being knows, the first warmth, the first safety; the tradition took the single most comforting object in human experience, enlarged it past reason, and posted it in the dark as a threat. That is not crude. That is precise. The Hantu Tetek is the only monster in this series' catalogue whose weapon is comfort itself, weaponized — and her name has always confessed it.

One more sorting-rule from the folklore-studies register will serve the whole volume: the Malay-Indonesian catalogue divides its beings into persons and functions, and the Hantu Tetek is the purest function in it. A person-ghost has a biography — the langsuir's childbed death, the pocong's unfinished account, the oily man's bargain — and one can tell its story. A function-ghost has an office: the boundary, the hour, the duty, and a body built to display it. The jembalang of Volume 10 is the earth's function; the hantu air is the water's; and the Hantu Tetek is the village's — the function of the edge, of the come-home-now, of the dark that claims what will not come in.

This is why no telling gives her a face or a death: offices do not have biographies. And it is why the volume ahead keeps finding her in the strangest company — saints' shrines, ritual puppets, parenting manuals — because a function, unlike a person, can be everywhere the job needs doing. The function-reading also explains the book's most awkward evidence problem before it can arise: the Hantu Tetek has no fixed legend-text to quote. Her siblings' chapters run on recorded tellings — the oily man's pact, the pocong's debt — but a search for the breast ghost's master narrative returns only fragments: a warning here, a rule there, an auntie's account, a puppet's scene.

The folklorist would once have filed that thinness as a defect, a monster under-documented; the function-reading files it as her signature. The tellings are scattered because the office was everywhere — every kampung staffed the boundary with her, and no village needed another village's version, because each already had the one asset the office requires: a dark at the edge, children to bring in, and a grandmother's voice to do the naming. The monster was never centralised, because the job never was.

One feature of the record will strike the careful reader immediately, and it belongs in the definition: the Hantu Tetek has no first-person encounters in her lore. Ask the catalogue for a langsuir story and you get a case — the caught wife, the nails cut, the dance at the merry-making. Ask for a toyol and you get the robbed shopkeeper. Ask for the breast ghost and you get warnings — third-hand, auntie-delivered, at dusk, about what happens to children who go past the tree-line; the closest the record comes to testimony is the family friend who "was almost taken" or the cousin who "saw her from far."

The absence is diagnostic, and Chapter 4 completes it: an encounter with her is the failure of the system that runs her, and the system's designers were not failures. The figure was built — like all the best disciplinary machinery — to be believed in from a distance and never tested: her sightings are all at tree-line distance, all brief, all second-hand. The record contains no close calls because the wardenship's whole point was that there were never any.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io