Introduction

The story of Lut (عليه السلام) is the Quran's starkest warning about the consequences of moral corruption. Where Nuh's story is about patience, Hud's about power, Salih's about testing, and Ibrahim's about faith, Lut's story is about the limit of divine tolerance — the point at which a civilization's corruption becomes so complete, so entrenched, so celebrated that the only remaining response is removal.

Lut was Ibrahim's nephew. He traveled with Ibrahim from their homeland and was sent as a prophet to the people of the cities that the Quran calls "the people of Lut" — the inhabitants of Sodom and the surrounding settlements.

These cities were prosperous, wealthy, and advanced. They were also the site of a corruption so unprecedented that the Quran records it as a first:

The Book opens his file with the charge of unprecedent-edness — an immorality "as no one has preceded you with among the worlds" (7:80) — whose full wording this book studies in its second chapter.

No one had preceded them. This is the Quran's assessment: what the people of Lut were doing was not just wrong; it was unprecedented. It was a corruption that no civilization before them had practiced. And the response to this unprecedented corruption was an unprecedented punishment: the angels came — not wind, not water, not sound, but angels — to destroy the cities entirely.

The Quran tells Lut's story across multiple surahs, and each retelling adds a dimension. The narrative is connected to Ibrahim's story — the same angels who visited Ibrahim with the news of Ishaq also came to destroy Lut's people. The two events are linked: the birth of a prophet's son and the death of a corrupt people, announced by the same messengers on the same journey.

This book traces Lut's story through every Quranic passage, exploring the people, the corruption, Lut's warning, the angels' visit, the destruction, and the lessons. It is the seventh light in the NurOne - The Prophets series — the light that illuminated the boundary between tolerance and destruction, and the point beyond which a civilization cannot return.

The story of Lut in the Quran is a story of a prophet who stood alone in a city that had abandoned every boundary. In Surah Al-A'raf, Allah describes the moment of separation: "And We saved him and his family, except his wife — she was of those who remained behind. And We rained upon them a rain. Then see how was the end of the criminals" (7:83-84). Lut's mission was not to reform the city but to deliver the message and to leave with those who believed. His wife stayed behind — not because she could not leave physically but because her heart belonged to the people who were about to be destroyed.

The Quran uses her as a permanent example of whoever is near to the truth but not of it. The chapters that follow trace the story of Lut from the arrival of the angels, through the warning, the destruction, and the aftermath, always drawing from the verses as they appear across the surahs and allowing the Quran to speak in its own voice. The Quran elsewhere records about the people of Lut: "And they had no argument except that they said: Drive out the family of Lut from your city. Indeed, they are people who keep themselves pure" (27:56).

The irony is sharp — the people who practiced every form of indecency accused the one righteous man of being "too pure" for their city. The Quran captures in this single verse the psychology of a society that has inverted its moral compass: the presence of goodness becomes an offense, and the demand for purity becomes grounds for expulsion. Lut's story is not merely about destruction. It is about the moment when a society decides that decency is intolerable — and the moment when Allah decides that the society has decided enough.

In a related verse, the Quran says the aftermath of Lut's rescue: "And We brought out those who believed in it. And We did not find in it except one house of Muslims. And We left in it a sign for those who fear the painful punishment" (51:35-37). The "one house" — the house of Lut — was the sole household of faith in an entire city. The Quran does not tell this story to condemn a people long gone. It tells it as a sign for those who live after, a reminder that the presence of a single believer does not save a city that has rejected the truth, and that the absence of a city does not harm the believer who has been saved by the One who sent the message. Lut's story ends with his rescue and the destruction of everything behind him — a conclusion that the Quran revisits in multiple surahs, always with the same structure: warning, rejection, rescue, destruction, remnant.

Chapter 1: Lut in the Quran

Lut (عليه السلام) is mentioned by name 27 times in the Quran across 13 surahs.

His story is told in parallel with Ibrahim's — the same angels who visited Ibrahim also came to Lut, and the Quran weaves the two narratives together.

Surah Al-A'raf (7:80-84) — The core narrative: Lut's message, the unprecedented corruption, the people's rejection, and the punishment.

Surah Hud (11:77-83) — The most detailed passage: the angels arrive, Lut's distress, the people's assault, the angels' intervention, the destruction.

Surah Al-Hijr (15:61-79) — A parallel version of the angels' visit and the destruction, with emphasis on the geographic transformation.

Surah Ash-Shu'ara (26:160-175) — The denial pattern with emphasis on the people's response to Lut's message.

Surah An-Naml (27:54-58) — A compressed version focusing on the people's response and the punishment.

Surah Al-Ankabut (29:28-35) — Lut's warning, the people's challenge, and the destruction, with a mention of the ruined cities as a sign.

Surah As-Saffat (37:133-138) — Lut as one of the believers, with a brief mention of the saved and the destroyed.

Surah Al-Qamar (54:33-39) — The concise retelling, emphasizing the people's mockery and the morning punishment.

Surah Al-Anbiya (21:74-75) — Lut given wisdom and knowledge, placed among the righteous.

Surah Ad-Dhariyat (51:31-37) — The angels' mission to destroy Lut's people.

Surah Al-Muddaththir (74:11-26) — Indirect reference to the destruction as a warning.

Surah Al-Haqqah (69:9-10) — The punishment of Lut's people as part of the pattern of divine justice.

The people of Lut lived in a region traditionally identified as the Jordan Valley, near the Dead Sea. The Quran describes a prosperous civilization with abundant resources:

"And We made the highest part of the land its lowest and rained upon them stones of hard clay" (15:74, from the context of the geographic transformation).

The cities of Lut's people were agriculturally rich, situated in a fertile valley. They had wealth, security, and comfort. The Quran does not dwell on their material prosperity — the focus is on their moral condition. The wealth is mentioned only as context for the corruption: a civilization that had everything and used its prosperity not for good but for unprecedented transgression.

The Quran identifies the corruption of Lut's people with specificity. In Surah Al-

A'raf:

"Indeed, you approach men with desire instead of women. Rather, you are a transgressing people" (7:81).

And in Surah An-Naml:

"Do you indeed approach men with desire and abandon what your Lord has created for you of mates? Rather, you are a people transgressing" (27:55-56).

The Quran describes their primary sin as a form of immorality that was unprecedented — no prior civilization had practiced it. The people of Lut had institutionalized a corruption that went beyond individual acts into a collective practice.

The Quran also mentions other aspects of the people's corruption:

Highway robbery. In Surah Al-Ankabut:

"And of the people of Lut is the one who stopped travelers" (29:29, from the broader context). The people of Lut were known for ambushing travelers — a combination of violence and theft that made the roads around their cities dangerous.

Rejection of guests. When the angels came to Lut as guests, the people of the city rushed to assault them. This was not an isolated incident; it was a pattern. The people of Lut had a practice of attacking guests — an inversion of the sacred duty of hospitality that the Arabian and Semitic worlds held in the highest regard.

Mockery of reform. In Surah Al-Hijr:

"He said: These are my daughters, if you must act. By your life, indeed they wander in their intoxication, not perceiving" (15:71-72).

The people were so deeply entrenched in their behavior that they could not perceive the wrongness of it. They wandered in a metaphorical intoxication — drunk not on wine but on their own corruption, unable to see what was obvious to any sober observer.

Rejection of the prophet. Like all peoples in the Quran, Lut's people rejected the prophet:

"They said: Drive out the family of Lut from your city. Indeed, they are people who keep themselves pure" (27:56).

The people wanted to expel Lut and his family because they were "pure" — they maintained standards of morality that the rest of the city found intolerable. The presence of a righteous community was an indictment of the corrupt one, and the corrupt one wanted the indictment removed.

Lut was the son of Haran, who was Ibrahim's brother. He was Ibrahim's nephew — a member of the same family, the same journey, the same faith. When Ibrahim left his people, Lut went with him:

"And We delivered him and Lut to the land which We had blessed for the worlds" (21:71).

Lut was later sent as a prophet to the people of the cities. He was both a prophet and a resident — a man who lived among the people he was sent to warn. This made his position uniquely difficult: he was not an outsider speaking to strangers. He was a neighbor speaking to neighbors, a citizen speaking to citizens, a man whose daily life was intertwined with the people who rejected him.

The Quran describes Lut as a believer:

"And Lut was of the believers" (37:133).

And as a prophet given wisdom:

"And to Lut We gave judgment and knowledge, and We saved him from the city that was committing defiled deeds. Indeed, they were an evil people, a defiantly disobedient people" (21:74-75).

Lut was not just a warner. He was a wise man — given judgment (hukm) and knowledge ('ilm). He understood the depth of the corruption and the inevitability of the consequence. His wisdom was not just in what he said but in what he recognized: this people had passed the point of return.

Lut's story is inseparable from Ibrahim's. The angels who visited Ibrahim carried the news of both events: the birth of Ishaq and the destruction of Lut's people. The Quran presents them as two sides of the same coin — the mercy of a new life and the justice of a destroyed one:

"[The angels said]: We have been sent to a people who are criminals, except the family of Lut. We will save them all except his wife" (15:58-60).

The same messengers who carried the good news of life to Ibrahim carried the decree of death to Lut's people. The connection is theological: the God who gives life also takes it, the God who fulfills promises also executes threats, and the God who builds nations also destroys them. The two events — birth and destruction — are part of the same divine action, carried out by the same messengers.

The Quran uses Lut's story as a universal warning. The ruined cities are presented as a sign for all who pass by:

"And indeed, you pass by them in the morning and at night. Then do you not understand?" (37:137-138).

The Quran addresses its original audience — the people of Makkah — and says: you pass by the ruins of Lut's people. You see them. You know what happened. And yet you do not understand. The ruins are not just historical sites; they are living lessons, visible to every traveler, available to every observer. whoever passes by the ruins and does not understand is anyone who is in danger of repeating the same error.
