SAMPLE

The Oath-Bound Knight

The Personality That Keeps Promises Past the Grave

Aiman Sterling

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Contents

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Oath-Bound Knight at a Glance

Chapter 2: The Core — The Oath as Skeleton

Chapter 3: The Instrument — The Word

Chapter 4: The Craft — The Kept Ledger

Chapter 5: The Cost: The Ledger of the Unpriced Vow

Chapter 6: The Dark Side: The Vow Past Sense

Chapter 8: The Oath-Bound Knight in Love and Friendship

Chapter 9: The Matchups — Companions, Rivals, and the Other Types

Chapter 10: From Grave to Living — the Knight Amending the Vow

Afterword

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

You know this person, or you are this person. The record begins with its most iron exhibit: the one whose word is the only currency in the family that has never once bounced — the debt paid decades after the creditor forgot it; the secret kept for the dead; the arrival exactly as sworn, in any weather, at any cost — and the timeline's found line, spoken by a nephew of thirty years with reverence and one worried eye: if he says he will be there, you can build the wedding around it; and if he swore something at nineteen, it is still running, and nobody alive remembers why. The friend who never breaks a promise, ever, not the small ones — the ride to the airport at four in the morning, the loan repaid to the gram a year early, the silence held for a person who has long since stopped deserving it — and the file's quiet entry beside the loyalty: the type has kept every vow it ever made except the ones it made to itself. And the deathbed the record cannot close: the promise sworn to a dying parent — take care of her; keep them together; never let the farm go — sworn at nineteen, on the name, in the room where the words were witnessed — and the engine that followed, running for forty years past sense, past convenience, past the beneficiary's own release — the mother long gone, the farm a museum nobody visits, the family scattered and happy — and the type, at sixty, still keeping it, still paying for it, still unable to say what the whole record can: the promise outlived its purpose decades ago, and the vow's keeper has never once been released, because the type never learned that honor can amend.

This is a case file on the Oath-Bound Knight: the personality that keeps promises past the grave.

The founding scene is the vow witnessed young — and the briefcase marks what makes it the tally's most structural origin: the child in the world of unkept words — the adults who said things and did not do them; the promises made to the child and broken, broken, broken — and then the extremis: the dying parent, the bedside, the child's hand taken, and the words that changed everything: promise me. And the child — small, crushed, watching the one reliable thing in the world prepare to leave — made the only structure the chaos had ever contained: I promise. Sworn on the name, witnessed by death itself, and the discovery, total and permanent: a promise, for me, is load-bearing — the child discovered that a kept word is the one thing the weather cannot move, and swore, in that room, the constitution of the whole life: my word will be the one thing in this world that holds.

The engine this builds is the oath as skeleton: the word kept past convenience, past sense, past the beneficiary's own release; honor as the self's load-bearing beam — and the child, quite reasonably, staying: in the world of unkept words, the kept word is rare coin, and the type was paid in trust, in reverence, in identity: the reliable one; the one whose word is iron; the one you build weddings around — and the flaw is built into the same beam, because a skeleton, the record's central finding, cannot be audited from inside: the type does not experience its oaths as choices; the type experiences them as bones — and amending a vow feels, to this constitution, not like governance but like amputation — and so the vows made by the child in extremis run unexamined for decades, and the heart offered as collateral, again and again, for promises the world released long ago: the record's dry arithmetic: the type has paid, faithfully, forty years of interest on a debt the creditor forgave at the funeral.

And the growth: the vow re-examined — and the briefcase is precise, because this is the upward move the type will experience as betrayal: not the breaking of the oath — the record defends the word to the last page: the kept promise is the catalog's most beautiful instrument, and a world of them would be a world without contracts — but the amending: the distinction the whole life turns on, between the word and the purpose — the dying parent did not want the farm; the dying parent wanted the family held — and the growth's radical clause: the living promise outranks the dead one; the oath re-sworn, not abandoned, to the purpose's living heir; and the discovery, drawn from the subtype's own founding scene: the child promised a person, not a building — and the adult, keeping the building and losing the people, has kept the letter and amputated the spirit, and called it honor.

If you are this subtype, the book's wager is exact: you are the most trusted word in every room you enter, and the timeline holds the proof — the debts paid, the arrivals kept, the secrets held for the dead — and the briefcase's question, held across ten chapters and asked flat-out here so you can try standing in it: which of your oaths are still alive? — because the timeline's answer, in every case, is the assessment the beam cannot inspect: at least one — the old one, the bedside one, the one sworn at nineteen in the worst hour of the life — is being kept past its purpose, by a self that has never once asked whether the promise's recipient would still want it kept this way — and the dead, the record will state plainly, do not update their requests; only the living can.

If you love one, your standing order is precise and counterintuitive: do not envy the word — the type's reliability is real, and it is also the cage; and do not test it — the type will win any test of endurance you set, and pay for it in sleep; the instruction that works, and the timeline has tested it: ask the amending question, kindly — what was the promise for? — because the Oath-Bound Knight does not need permission to break the word; the type needs help finding the purpose, and the courage to re-sworn it to the living — the one amendment the constitution was never taught, by a world that broke its words instead of amending them.

Turn the page. The Knight is still out there — mid-errand, mid-debt, mid-arrival, forty years into a promise made to a room that has been empty for decades — and the file's promise is the timeline's plainest: the word was always the gift; the purpose was always the point; and the self, once it learns to amend, becomes what it always looked like from the outside and never was: not a man made of iron — one whole sworn soul, whose word, at last, is kept to the living, and whose honor, at last, is alive.

A note on the file's vault before the oath is opened, because this portrait will read heavier than the shelf around it, and the record owes the reader the iron's disclosure: the pages ahead are kept, deliberately, at the type's own gauge — the vow, so structural, entered at its full load-bearing weight; the keeping, so legendary, documented at its true cost; the amendment, so feared, examined at its honest hinges — because a portrait of the Oath- Bound Knight at the archivist's looser registers would misjudge the instrument entirely: the word, so kept past convenience, is not this type's stubbornness; it is this type's skeleton — the promise, witnessed young, becoming the self's load-bearing beam, honor replacing bone — and the reader who is this type should be told, at the vault's door, the finding the record verified in every biography and the world, so quick to release, never once said plainly: the vow was supposed to serve you, and somewhere in the decades, the order reversed — and the whole case, when the growth chapter amends the word, will not ask the Knight to break the oath (the record would sooner default on its own bonds) — it will ask the question the iron, so faithful, has never once been asked at inspection: who is the promise for? — which is, the file can disclose, the only question in the catalog whose answer outlives the beneficiary — and the whole book is the amendment, witnessed at last by the living.

And the file's door note to the second reader — the one who has lived junior to a founding vow for years, has honored the Knight's honor from the second seat, and has sometimes wondered whether the estate would ever be re-titled: the portrait ahead will survey the vault honestly — the load map, the collateral census, the grave's amendment test — and the file owes you its own finding at the door, before the love chapter hands you the second signature: you were never competing with the dead — the lien, so senior, was a child's engineering, not a rival's claim, and the second seat, so patient, was always the amendment's co-signatory, waiting — and the record's instruction, held out with both hands because the estate assigns you one sentence: 'put me on the first page' — the request, so small, the grown cases all confirm, is the whole refinancing — and the Knight, the file has charted, has been waiting for it longer than you have — the iron, it turns out, wanted an heir.

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Oath-Bound Knight at a Glance

Before anyone speaks, the word has been weighed — and the briefcase must open with the honest fact that makes this subtype so trusted and so tired: the Oath-Bound Knight is certainty. The promise made with the whole face; the arrival at the hour sworn, in any weather; the debt repaid to the gram, remembered when everyone else has forgotten it exists — and the record's sharp note: the certainty is load-bearing — it is the skeleton, not a suit: the kept word is not something the type does; it is what the type is, and the whole biography is organized around it the way a body is organized around its spine.

Sharper under observation: watch what happens when the type says I will — the tone drops, the jaw sets, the sentence arrives like something notarized — and watch, sharper still, what happens when someone else breaks a word to the Knight: the injury is not strategic or financial; it is anatomical — the file has watched this type grieve a broken promise like a death, and the record's founding entry beside it: this subtype is the only one in this tally whose bones are made of the thing the world treats as small change.

The manner carries the iron, and the briefcase must render it precisely, because it is so often mistaken for stubbornness: the Knight's keeping is not obstinacy; it is identity — the vow, once given, is not stored, recalled, or reviewed; it is installed — and the record's testimony, gathered from the type's people across every case, is word for word the same: they do not talk about it; it just gets done — the keeping performed the way a heart performs: without ceremony, without an audience, without ever once asking whether it still wants to.

Sharper under observation: the Knight's tells are never in the kept promises; they are in the cost — the forty- mile drive in the snow to honor a maybe; the loan repaid by a man who needed the money more than the creditor did; the secret held for the dead at the price of the living — and the briefcase's found rhythm, uniform across every case: this subtype is brilliant at the arrival and silent about the invoice, and the silence, the record has learned, is the whole finding: the cost was never supposed to be discussed, because the cost is what separates a promise from a contract.

And underneath the iron runs the tell the subtype's loved ones all report and this subtype never sees: the unaudited vault of vows — the promises made decades ago, still running, unexamined, unranked: the deathbed oath outranking the spouse's needs; the vow to the dead outranking the debt to the living; the word given at nineteen governing the body at sixty — and the briefcase's correction, entered in the same ink as the reverence: the skeleton holds the self up, and the skeleton holds the self in — and the record's found line, from the nephew of thirty years, held with the love the file can no longer withhold: he is the most reliable man alive, and I do not think he has ever once asked himself what any of it is for.

The file holds two versions of the origin, and they are both true, and they meet in the same bedside.

In the first version, the words were weather — the adult world a marketplace of unkept promises: the parent who said next weekend and meant nothing; the household where words were spent like confetti and honored like confetti — and the child, watching, collecting the broken words in the place other children collect stamps, discovered the world's core disappointment: a promise, around here, is a sound, not a structure — and the child's answer, made quietly and years before the extremis: mine will be different; my word will be the one thing that holds.

In the second version, the extremis came first — the dying parent, the bedside, the child's hand taken and held by the one reliable thing in the world — and the words that changed everything: promise me. And the child — crushed, terrified, watching the only weather that mattered prepare to leave — made the vow: I promise. Sworn on the name, witnessed by death itself, in the one room where a broken word would finally mean something — and the child discovered the engine's founding law, the one that would run the whole life: a promise, for me, is structural — the vow was not a plan; it was a beam — and the self, from that hour, was built around it.

And the origin moment, where the versions converge, is always a witnessed vow, and always the same vow in every case: the child in the room where everything is about to change, giving the one thing a child has that an adult cannot: the absolute word — not hedged, not reasoned, not adult — and the constitution signed in that hour: my word will be the one thing in this world that holds; I will keep it past convenience, past sense, past the beneficiary's own release — and the timeline must enter the last clause with the care this case deserves — past the asking of what it was for. The record's correction follows the forewarningature like a shadow follows a beam: the vow was made by a child, in the worst hour of the life, with no power to price it and no adult present to scope it — and the adult who inherited it has kept it whole, because keeping things whole is what the type is — and the briefcase's founding correction, filed beside the child at the bedside: the promise was structural, and it saved the child — and it was never once re-signed by an adult, which means the constitution of the whole life was drafted at nineteen, in a dying room, and amended never.

The album opens the way every one of these albums opens, and this case's is the most reliable in the catalog — which the briefcase notes, dryly, is the first finding: in an album of unkept words, one child's words hold. The school photographs: the face already set; the eyes that had seen the confetti-spend; the awards for dependability appearing in the same years as the favors — the errands run, the promises kept to other children, the nine-year-old already known on the street as the one who shows up. The family table — and the telling detail the briefcase marks at once: the adults' words arriving and dissolving like weather, and the child, everywhere in the frame, quietly not doing that — the album's pattern, visible by the third grade: the promises made small, made few, and kept all — the record's dry entry: even then, the type priced the word correctly, and spent it like the rare coin it was.

The album's most telling photo is the one nobody asks to see: the bedside — the dying parent's hand on the child's; the room's terrible stillness; the small face making the vow — the jaw set, the eyes already iron — and the record's sharp entry beside it: the vow was real, and the vow was unpriced — no scope, no exit clause, no review date — the child promising what a child could not price, and the whole adult life inheriting the contract uncollateralized: the heart offered as the security, and the heart, the file notes, was never once asked.

And the album closes on the closer this series always saves: the early draft already the adult — the adolescence organized around the kept: the commitments held at cost; the friends' secrets banked like gold; the reputation, by sixteen, already iron — and the one photograph in the briefcase's albums that shows the cost, and it is the quietest: the child alone, mid-errand, keeping a promise to someone who is not in the frame, in the rain, unhurried — the record's entry beside it: the keeping was never performed at anyone; it was performed at nothing — witnessed by nobody, thanked by nobody, and done anyway, which is the whole type, and the whole case: the child who decided the word would hold in a world that did not, and built a self out of the decision — the most beautiful structure in this catalog, and the only one, the record notes, whose blueprint was written by a grieving child and never reviewed by the adult who lives in it.

Energy: steady, heavy, and sworn — the Knight runs on commitment, not mood; the type has never once been known to be unreliable, and the world bills it accordingly.

Ambition: the word kept — not the empire, not the applause: the arrival; the type would rather honor a promise at cost than win a prize at a breach.

Vanity structure: the iron — the pride is in being the one whose word holds; the type would rather die reliable than live amended, and the file has watched the bend of exactly that cost, case after case.

Loyalty: total, structural, and unranked — the timeline's driest note on this case: the Knight's oaths are all first — the dead one and the living one holding the same rank, in the same body, until the body pays for the tie.

Weakness: the unaudited vow — the promise made in extremis, never re-signed by the adult, outranking the living and the present; the amendment, never learned.

Unspoken need: to be released — the living beneficiary's permission to amend; the discovery that honor can update without breaking; the need the beam guards like a fracture line, because asking would mean the word is discussable, and the word, in this constitution, is not.

At a party. Present, brief, and arrived as sworn — the Knight honors the commitment to the minute, and the file's sharp detail: the type is the only guest whose yes and no are both absolute — the yes arriving in any weather, the no said with the same iron, and the party, the record notes, rearranges its plans around the type's word, because the type's word is the only thing in the room that does not drift — and the cost is quiet: the Knight leaves when the type said it would, even from the best hour of the best night, because the departure, too, was sworn.

In a new job. Trusted by the second week — the type's signature precedes it: the deadlines held, the commitments kept to the gram, the boss, by month three, sleeping on the Knight's word — and the timeline's warning arrives on schedule: the workplace will load the type the way the world loads a bridge pylon — the unkeepable deadlines assigned to the one who will not say cannot — and the briefcase's most reliable workplace finding: the Knight is the last employee the institution ever asks at what cost, because the answer, the type's whole biography long, has been irrelevant: it gets done.

Under sudden pressure. The type's finest hour, and the briefcase enters it without irony: the Oath-Bound Knight in a crisis is the record's ballast — the promise kept through the storm, the arrival made through the snow, the commitment held while the rest of the room renegotiates — and the record's favorite entry: in the files' worst hours, the people around this type did not need hope; they needed the schedule, and the schedule held — but the file's delicate finding, uniform across every case: the crisis is also where the type swears its worst vows — the promises made in the adrenaline, the anything, I promise, anything of the hospital corridor — the constitution's most expensive habit: extremis is the Knight's native weather, and the vows made in it are never priced.

In a boring meeting. Present, level, and counting — the record's x-ray: the subtype is not bored; the type is auditing: every commitment in the room being logged, weighed, and believed or not — the file's tender note: the meeting's minutes say the type was quiet, and the vault says the type was keeping score of the room's words, because keeping score of words is what the beam does for a living.

On holiday. The one weather the constitution cannot plan — the record's tenderest finding for this case: on holiday, the Knight is off duty, and the off-duty Knight does not know what to do — the itinerary kept like a vow; the relaxation scheduled; and the file's finding, dry and fond: the type's vacations are the most punctual in this catalog — and the tell is in the return, not the departure: the type's mood, in every case, lifts on the flight home, when the promises resume; the record's line: the Knight is the only type in seventy-two volumes that is happier at work than at rest, because the work is where the skeleton is used.

The Steadfast Guardian (Volume 2) is the nearest neighbor, and the confusion is the briefcase's most common, because both types are counted on and both types hold: the Guardian's promise is a presence — I will stay with you — the vow held to a person, felt, renewed, warm, amendable by the living beneficiary in the living hour (stay a little longer; go home now, you have done enough); the Knight's promise is a performance — I will do the thing — the vow held to a deed, structural, cold in the beautiful way iron is, amendable by no one, because the deed, in this constitution, does not move.

The test: give each of them an impossible promise to a dying person. The Guardian will hold the person; the Knight will hold the promise — and the timeline's one-line border, dry and final: the Guardian keeps faith; the Knight keeps word — and the deepest border, entered because the two are genuinely siblings and the mature pair needs each other's half: the Guardian teaches the Knight that promises are made to people, and people are living, and living things can be asked; the Knight teaches the Guardian that a word, once given, is the rarest thing in this catalog — and only one of them has ever broken it, and only one of them has ever needed to amend it, which is the whole difference, and the briefcase down to the last detail.

The Soul Broker (Volume 69) is the misreading the world makes, because both types honor their terms to the gram: the Broker's promise is a contract — symmetric, priced, honored because the ledger must balance; the terms are kept to the exchange; the Broker keeps the word because the word is what is owed. The Knight's promise is a covenant — unilateral, unpriced, honored because the self is made of it; the terms are kept to the self; the Knight keeps the word because the word is what the self is. The test: waive the debt.

Tell the Broker the account is forgiven — and watch the Broker's crisis: a ledger that cannot balance is the Broker's hell, and the forgiveness, the file has found, is processed — entered, grieved, and priced within a week. Tell the Knight the debt is forgiven — and watch the type pay it anyway: the record has watched this type repay released debts for decades, and the type's answer, verbatim, across every case: it was not owed to you anymore; it was owed to me — and the border, the file's sharpest from the four-door weather: the Broker keeps terms; the Knight keeps the vow — one is an economy, the other is a spine, and only one of them survives the creditor's forgiveness intact.

The Burdened Ruler (Volume 14) is the sibling the institutions confuse constantly — both types carry, both types hold the line, both are the hinge: the Ruler carries the realm and keeps its offices — and the office's promises are amendable, because the office is living: the Ruler re-signs, renegotiates, revokes, governs; the vow serves the realm, and when the realm changes, the vow changes with it — the Ruler amends the way breathing happens, and calls it duty. The Knight carries the word and keeps its deeds — and the deed's promises are iron, because the deed is not living; it was sworn once, witnessed once, and frozen: the Knight does not amend; the Knight endures, and calls it honor.

The test: change the circumstances. Give both of them a promise whose keeping has begun to harm what the promise was made to protect — the Ruler will amend it by the third council, and sleep that night; the Knight will keep it into the harm, and not sleep, and keep it anyway — and the record's one-line border, the chapter's last and the case's quietest: the Ruler amends the vow because the office is alive; the Knight cannot amend it because the vow is the Knight — and the tragedy, and the growth's whole door: the vow was supposed to serve; it was never supposed to replace.

And the glance file appends the arrival tell, the one that reads the type at the resolution the world never schedules: the Oath-Bound Knight, so reliable in the keeping, is charted by the file across every biography in the arrival itself — and the finding is the glance chapter's most honest entry: the type, so sworn, arrives exactly as stated — the time, so promised, met to the minute; the weather, so terrible, irrelevant (the file has the arrival logs: the storm, so documented, that the Knight walked through; the trip, so nonnegotiable, kept with a fever) — and the tell's honest layer, which the type has never once been shown: the punctuality, so famous, is not courtesy (the schedule, so kept, is the word, made visible — the arrival, so exact, functioning as a public reading of the oath: I said Tuesday; Tuesday is here; I am here) — and the arrival tell's practical reading, for the reader who has watched this type keep a meeting through a flood and wondered what the flood was for: the flood was the testimony — the keeping, so costly, proving the word's structural nature to a world that doubts everything — and the glance file's last field note, entered with the respect the iron has earned from every promise it has ever held: the arrival, so exact, has one documented exception the un- grown files never contain (the promise to the self, so unkept, in every biography — the one appointment, the file notes, the Knight has never once kept: the own life's Tuesday) — which, the whole file will show, is the growth chapter's entire docket.

The glance file's postscript, the small-word tell — the reading that completes the portrait's first pass, seen from the angle the world never prices: the Knight, so charted at the arrivals, is documented by the file across every biography in the casual promise kept — and the finding is the glance chapter's most honest entry: the type, so treaty-grade at the founding, runs the same iron at the everyday gauge (the 'I'll send it over', so idle, sent at midnight; the 'next week, maybe', so tentative, arriving as a calendar entry) — and the tell's honest mechanism: the small words, so over-kept, are the founding vow's inheritance law (the child, so sworn, learning that a word is a word is a word — the syllables, so light, weighing the same as the grave, because the scene never taught gauges) — and the practical reading, for the reader who has watched this type honor a 'maybe' like a covenant: the maybe was a covenant, in this instrument's grammar — and the record notes, with the glance chapter's characteristic precision: the small-word tell, the grown cases all confirm, is the most reliable field identification of the type in the whole file — the world breaks its maybes; the Knight keeps them — and the keeping, at the everyday gauge, is the founding scene, running fifty years deep in the ordinary.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io