SAMPLE

The Battle-Crowned Conqueror

The Personality That Only Feels Alive at War

Aiman Sterling

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Contents

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Battle-Crowned Conqueror at a Glance

Chapter 2: The Core — The Peacetime That Felt Like Dying

Chapter 3: The Instrument — The Campaign

Chapter 4: The Craft — Battle-Readiness as Reflex

Chapter 5: The Cost: The Ledger of the Drafted Life

Chapter 6: The Dark Side: The Manufactured War

Chapter 8: The Battle-Crowned Conqueror in Love and Friendship

Chapter 9: The Matchups — Companions, Rivals, and the Other Types

Afterword

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

You know this person, or you are this person. The emergency-room charge nurse who is invisible during the quiet shifts and magnificent during the crash — the calmer the monitor, the duller her eyes; the grayer the triage, the brighter the room — and the aftermath report's cleanest opening exhibit: the bored war correspondent who filed nothing from the two years of peace and filed a masterpiece from the first week of the war, and admitted it, over drinks, without a flicker of shame: I'm not happy unless it's bad. The startup founder who ran three companies on the fuel of near- death and bankrupted the fourth the moment it got stable — the record's finding, and the file's whole engine in one sentence: the Conqueror does not sabotage the success; the Conqueror sabotages the peace that follows it; the uncle who turns every Christmas into a campaign — the seating chart as a war map, the turkey as a deadline, the family gathered, brilliant, exhausted, and somehow safe, in a way they never are at the calm ones; the friend who is the first call in the crisis and the last call in the calm — the shoulder at two a.m., the general at the funeral, the strategist of the divorce, the hero of the flood — and the record's finding on the friendship's shape, which the file holds up gently for the household to read: the type is not unreliable; the type is reliable in reverse — present exactly when the world is ending, and unreachable, restless, half-gone, the moment it stops — and the friends' sentence, spoken with real love and real exhaustion: you only ever see them when your house is on fire; when the fire is out, they're already looking for the next one.

This is a case file on the Battle-Crowned Conqueror: the personality that only feels alive at war.

The first siege is the peacetime that felt like dying — and the war chest marks its cruelty immediately: this is the only first siege in the kingdom that occurred in the absence of an event. No blow, no table, no wound anyone could point at: a quiet, ordinary, functional house — and a child for whom the quiet was unbearable — not bored, the file is precise; anemic — the color draining out of the days, the body going somewhere the adults could not follow — until the afternoon the crisis came: the ambulance, the argument that split the house, the accident at the corner, the year everything went wrong — and the child, in the middle of it, came alive: organized, calm where others panicked, useful, real for the first time in the record's memory — and the discovery, entered in the file's most terrible hand: the type learned, at the worst moment of the family's life, that the worst moments were the only ones in which the type existed — and the constitution that follows is the engine's whole law: calm is death; stakes are oxygen; peace is the enemy — and the type has spent a lifetime, honestly and catastrophically, making sure the supply never runs out.

And the war chest will honor what deserves honoring, because the aftermath report earns it and the world keeps the receipts: this is the kingdom's best crisis. The clear head that arrives exactly when heads are needed; the energy that does not flag because the emergency feeds it; the decisions made in minutes that the peacetime personalities spend committees on; the triage instinct, the triage calm, the crisis room that organizes itself around the type's stillness — the record's rescues are real and the file enters them in full: the flood coordinated, the crash survived, the company saved on the last runway, the family held together through the worst year by the one member who was, for once, well — and the file's honest ledger entry: the Conqueror is the person you want in the room when the room is on fire, and there is no second place.

But the flaw is built into the same engine, and the ledger audits it in the same ink: aliveness that requires stakes metabolizes everything into them — the argument sought like a gym; the deadline invented where none was needed; the marriage drafted into a campaign without signing up; the inbox militarized, the kitchen turned into a front, the household conscripted — and the aftermath report's central finding, uniform across every crusade: the Conqueror does not prefer war; the Conqueror needs it — and a need that cannot be spoken will be manufactured — the shadow's whole signature: the veteran with no front, drafting the people they love into wars nobody declared, and being happiest during the worst year the family ever had, and the aftermath report's quietest entry, which the crowned one's loved ones hold and almost never say: we learned to be afraid of the good times, because the good times are when the crowned one starts looking for the bad ones.

And the consolidation: the campaign subjugated to construction — and the war chest is precise, because this is the consolidation the crowned one fears more than any wound: not the fire out; the fire re-pointed — the juggernaut kept intact, the aliveness kept, the stakes kept, and aimed at things that build — the campaign with an endpoint, the marathon, the project, the build — stakes that metabolize into aliveness without requiring casualties; and the aftermath report's central discovery, which the whole engine rests on: the crowned one was never addicted to war; the crowned one was starving for existence — the crisis only ever proved the crowned one was real — and the proof, the consolidation finds, can be manufactured at will, in peacetime, in construction, in the campaign the crowned one declares on purpose against a mountain that has never once hurt anyone; and the mature Conqueror in the aftermath report is not calm; the mature Conqueror is mobilized — the same engine, the same fire, the same magnificent crisis-head, deployed against things that outlast the victory.

If you are this type, the conqueror's creed's wager is exact: you are the best day of everyone's worst day, and the worst weather of every good one — and the aftermath report's arithmetic is on the table: the crisis paid you in aliveness, and the peace charged you in existence, and the exchange rate never changed since the quiet house: you learned that still meant nothing is real; the war chest's question, saved through ten chapters and finally asked here, in plain words, so you can practice standing still for it: what did the stillness feel like it was starving? — because the aftermath report's answer, in every crusade, is not excitement, not drama, not even attention: the stillness was starving the self — the crowned one goes gray in peacetime because peace, in this nervous system, is the state of not existing — and the discovery

the whole growth rests on: existence was never actually for sale at the front; it was available all along, at peace, and the crowned one has never once risked checking, because the last time the house was this quiet, the child went somewhere the adults could not follow, and the war brought them back, and the crowned one has been supplying the war ever since rather than ever feel that gray again.

If you love one, your instruction is exact and counterintuitive: do not give the crowned one peace — the crowned one experiences your calm as abandonment; and do not manufacture drama — the household that stages fights to keep the crowned one present is feeding the juggernaut it fears; the instruction that works, and the aftermath report has tested it: give the crowned one a construction — the project with a deadline, the mountain, the build, the campaign the crowned one can declare against something that isn't the family — because the Conqueror does not need the war; the Conqueror needs the war's aliveness, and aliveness, the aftermath report has verified, can be built.

Turn the page. The Conqueror is still out there — running toward the sirens, saving the company in the bad quarter, holding the family together in the worst year and then unraveling the moment it ends — and the war chest's promise is the aftermath report's plainest: the juggernaut was always the gift; the target was always the wound; and the fire, re-pointed at things that outlast, builds in peacetime everything it used to only defend in war.

A note on the file's artillery, before the campaign maps begin, because this volume's readers split into the two parties every war draws: the reader who is this type will inspect the portrait for admiration and find the first chapters full of it — the charge nurse magnificent, the crisis lit from within, the tiredness after the battle triumphant — and the file wants that reader to know the admiration is bait, laid by a record that respects the engine too much to lie about it, and designed to hold the type's attention through the later chapters, where the ledger is read and the manufactured wars are toured; the reader who lives with this type will read the same early chapters with clenched teeth — finally, someone has described it — and the file wants that reader to mark one page early: the growth chapter's single finding, which the whole book exists to deliver and which the record states now so it cannot be missed in the smoke: the Conqueror was never addicted to war; the Conqueror was addicted to aliveness, and war was merely the only aliveness the child ever found on the shelf — and aliveness, unlike war, is buildable in peacetime, which is the entire campaign this file was drafted to declare, and the reader on both sides of the living room is, the record notes with the careful neutrality of an archivist who has seen the tour before, holding the same book, aimed at the same spring, in the same house.

And the file's one caution, laid at the door because this type reads the door first: the pages ahead contain a tour of the manufactured wars — the drafted kitchen, the manufactured Sunday, the inbox taken like a briefing — and the reader who is this type will recognize a specific campaign or two and may be tempted to file the portrait as being about those particular wars, to be concluded and dismissed once the tour ends — and the record enters its caution against the maneuver, which the file has watched this type run on every mirror ever held: the campaigns are instances, not the engine — the portrait is about the weather that drafts them, and the weather, the type should check before dismissing, is reading this paragraph at the same speed it reads a situation report, scanning for the exit, in a book — and the file's last word at the door, given evenly, the way a good briefing officer gives it: read the whole file; the campaign at the end of it was written for you, and it is the only one in the catalog with no casualties on any side, and the record would not have drafted you for it if the type were not, by every measurement it holds, the finest soldier for it on the shelf.

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Battle-Crowned Conqueror at a Glance

the war chest opens on the manner, because the manner changes with the weather — and with this type, the war chest means it literally: the room's crisis level is the crowned one's vitality gauge. In calm: the muted version — physically present, atmospherically absent; the eyes on the door; the legs restless under the table; the sentences shorter than the silences between them; the phone checked like a sentry checking a horizon, and the record's burnees, describing the type at a quiet dinner, reach for the same phrase, gently: a pilot in a holding pattern. In crisis: the transformation, and the file gives it the full paragraph because it is the catalog's most visible metamorphosis — the voice drops and slows while everyone else's rises; the posture straightens; the eyes go bright and level; the pace goes from restless to precise; the boredom evaporates in one siren, and the type becomes, in the record's burnees' word, unmistakable, and they all use the same one: there — and the manner's last instrument, held for the cost chapters: the come-down — the crash after the campaign ends, the gray Tuesday, the exhaustion that no rest cures, the type pacing a peaceful house like a soldier on a wall with nothing left to guard, and the file's finding on the rhythm, uniform in every case: the Conqueror's mood does not track fortune, love, or health; it tracks stakes, and the household has learned to read the gauge without being taught: the type's brightness is a weather service, and the forecast is never about the weather.

The founding scene is the peacetime that felt like dying, and the file marks what makes it unique in the catalog: it happened in the absence of anything. No blow landed; no voice was raised; there was a house — quiet, ordinary, functional — and a child in it who was starving in a way nobody could see: the days gray, the body restless, the self diluted, the child not sad — the file is precise; unreal — and the adults, questioned decades later, report a good childhood, a calm home, a quiet kid, and they are telling the truth, which is the founding scene's whole cruelty: the wound has no address.

Then the crisis — and the record finds one in every case: the accident, the ambulance, the year the money failed, the argument that split the house, the flood, the illness — and the child, in the middle of the family's worst season, came alive: calm when others panicked, useful when others froze, the one who carried, fetched, organized, waited up, held — and the family, the record notes with the scene's quiet tragedy, was grateful — the crisis made the child visible, and the child made the crisis survivable, and both parties learned the wrong lesson perfectly: the file's founding discovery, entered in the ink the catalog saves for constitutions: the type was only real when something was at stake — and the law that follows has governed every day since: calm is anemia; stakes are oxygen; peace is the enemy. the war chest's note, held for ten chapters: the scene was real and the aliveness was real and the rescue was real — and the conclusion was a child's, drawn from a sample of one: that the aliveness belonged to the crisis, when it belonged, the whole growth will find, to the child — who has spent a lifetime re-supplying the crisis rather than

risk being nobody again.

the war chest keeps five photographs, and the album, read correctly, is the juggernaut's autobiography. In the first, the quiet house — and the war chest notes what is absent: chaos, volume, a loud table, anything the kingdom's other albums hold — a functional home, and a child gray inside it, and the photograph's caption is the album's whole mystery: the aftermath report cannot show you the wound, and neither can the crowned one; the crowned one will tell you the childhood was fine, and mean it, and be unable to explain why fine nearly killed them.

In the second, the discovery — the crisis year, the ambulance lights across the child's face, and the child transfixed — the record's most unsettling photograph: an eleven-year-old at their most alive during the family's worst hour, and the file enters the caption plainly: no one failed here; a drowning child was thrown a rope and grabbed it, and the rope happened to be made of emergency. In the third, the search — the games turned to war: the board not just played but flipped; the rules of every game escalated until the game was a campaign; the neighborhood sports arranged into seasons, standings, rivalries, championships, the child inventing stakes the way the other children invented games — and the file's finding on the photograph, uniform: the type was never a sore loser; the type was a bored winner — the victory crossed off in one breath, the eyes already hunting the next board — because the win, the file notes, was never the point; the war was.

In the fourth, the label — the adults convening around the child's new clarity: so calm in a crisis; a natural leader; nothing rattles him — and the war chest marks the label as the album's cruel christening: the child was praised, permanently, for the only state in which the child existed, and the praise welded the constitution in place — the aftermath report's dry note: the household handed the child a medal for the rescue and never once asked, in the aftermath, why the child had been gray for the two quiet years before it.

And in the fifth, the photograph the war chest keeps last because it is the one that explains the adult: the aftermath — the crisis over, the family well, the house returned to its fine and functional quiet — and the child, at the window, watching the peace come back over the neighborhood like a weather front, and the aftermath report can read the face the adults never did: not gratitude; dread — the photograph's caption, emblazoned in the crowned one's own hand from a session decades later, and the war chest lets it stand alone: I was nine when I started waiting for the next one.

Energy: crisis-contingent — the catalog's only renewable battery that charges on stakes: flat in calm, total in emergency, and the file notes the fuel's terrible economics: the type's own peace generates no power; every joule must be imported.

Ambition: the summit while it is still being climbed — not the throne, not the pension: the campaign — the aftermath report's Conquerors are magnificent in the ascent and inexplicable at the top, and the war chest's finding on the pattern, uniform: the crowned one reaches the peak, looks around, and starts looking down — because the top is where the war ends, and the war was the only thing on the mountain the crowned one wanted.

Vanity structure: the crisis identity — the crowned one's secret pride, kept where the heart keeps it, is the sentence rehearsed for every court: when it really matters, I'm the one who shows up — and the war chest's finding, emblazoned with care: it is true, magnificently true, the aftermath report holds the receipts — and it is the crowned one's most expensive belief, because it quietly ranks the rest of life as when it doesn't really matter, and the crowned one's absence from that life is the belief's unpaid bill.

Loyalty: total, but situational — the Conqueror will carry you through the flood and forget your birthday in the same month, and mean nothing by either; the file marks it precisely: the type's loyalty is keyed to stakes, not to people — the record's friends' sentence, spoken with love and grief at once: they are the first ones there when your house burns down, and you will not see them again until it does.

Weakness: the come-down — the gray after the campaign; the type's return to peacetime is the record's most visible illness, and the file enters the mechanics plainly: what the crisis gave, the calm takes back, and the type, starving in a peaceful house, will do what every starving thing does — go hunting — and the record's manufactured wars, the shadow chapters' whole exhibit, all begin at exactly this line in the page.

Unspoken need: to exist when nothing is happening — the need held under every campaign for the entire loud life, and the war chest's finding on why it is never spoken: the need sounds, when spoken, like nothing at all — I want to feel real on an ordinary Tuesday — and the crowned one has no vocabulary for it, because the quiet house never taught one, and the war taught one perfectly; the aftermath report's Conquerors can name their best crisis in detail and cannot describe one ordinary happy day without reaching for a conflict to hang it on — which is the unification chapter's whole assignment: to teach the crowned one that Tuesday was never the enemy, and existence was never held at the front, and the child at the window, dreading the peace, was nine.

At the meeting, the crowned one is the room's contingency — half- checked-out in the routine agenda and suddenly central the moment the news breaks: the plan collapses, the number misses, the client walks, and the Conqueror's head comes up with the war chest's unmistakable brightness, and the room, the aftermath report verifies, reorganizes itself around the calm: the crowned one chairs nothing in peacetime and leads everything in crisis — and the war chest's finding on the aftermath, uniform and expensive: the crisis resolved, the crowned one's attention goes out with the sirens — the follow-through handed off, the maintenance unattended, the patient stabilized and abandoned — and the colleagues' sentence, same in every record: they save the project and never once come to the retro — because the retro, the war chest notes, is a meeting about the war after the war, and the crowned one's body has already left the building.

In a queue, in traffic, at the counter, the crowned one is the aftermath report's mildest crusade — and the war chest includes the war survey because it corrects a misconception: the Conqueror does not rage at the world's small frictions; the crowned one is calm at the counter, patient in traffic, courteous at the desk — because none of it is a war — and the war chest marks the exception that proves the juggernaut: the moment a conflict appears — the argument breaking out at the next register, the accident at the intersection, the man shouting at the gate agent — the crowned one is first in, delightedly, the peace of the queue forgotten in one heartbeat; and the war chest's one-line placement: the Conqueror does not fight the world; the Conqueror fights the war, wherever it surfaces, and will cross a parking lot to reach one.

At the good news of another, the crowned one is the aftermath report's most complicated toast: the congratulations arrive, generous and warm — and the war chest finds the flashpoint it holds with care, because it is tenderer than it looks: the good news is peacetime — a wedding, a promotion, a quiet triumph, the lovely low-stakes hour — and the crowned one, starving politely through the celebration, goes gray at exactly the moment everyone else lights up; the aftermath report's burnees' testimony on the wedding where the crowned one disappeared early, delivered with real hurt and, once the war chest is read, real forgiveness: they gave the best speech and left before the cake; I thought it was about them; it was about the noise — because a celebration has no enemy, and the crowned one's aliveness requires one, and the war chest's finding, emblazoned gently: the Conqueror is not jealous of the joy; the Conqueror is starved by it, and the household that learns to read this learns the conqueror's creed's whole engine from one toast.

On being contradicted, the crowned one is the kingdom's best listener — and the war chest includes the situation precisely because it breaks every expectation: the contradiction, even sharp, even unfair, does not wound the Conqueror the way it wounds the louder types; it feeds the crowned one — the argument, the war chest notes, is a war in miniature, and the crowned one lights up, leans in, gets precise — and the counterpart, expecting a fight, receives a debater's delight, and the war chest's finding on the aftermath: the Conqueror will argue the position at full brightness and not care about winning it — because the engagement, not the verdict, was the meal — and the aftermath report's colleagues' sentence, bewildered, on the crowned one who fought the proposal all afternoon and voted for it at five o'clock: I can't tell if they were against it or just hungry — and the war chest's placement, dry: against the peace, always; the proposal was just where it was standing.

At the apology, the crowned one is the aftermath report's most relieved defendant — because the apology marks the war's end, and the war chest notes what the crowned one does with it: the Conqueror apologizes for the campaign — the drafted household, the invented deadline, the ruined holiday, the argument that was never about the argument — with the full sincerity of a soldier back from a front nobody sanctioned: I don't know what happened; it was like I wasn't myself — and the war chest's correction, emblazoned in the margin of every such record, and the whole book turns on it: the crowned one was themselves — the crisis-self is not a false self; it is the crowned one's most self, and the peace-self is the mask the war wears between campaigns; the apology's real sentence, which the unification chapter finally teaches the crowned one to say, is not I wasn't myself; it is I was starving, and I fed it on you — and the aftermath report's households, given that sentence at last, report the same discovery, every time: the war was never about them; the war was about Tuesday.

The Hot-Headed Firebrand (Volume 63) — the nearest loud neighbor and the border the world war chests together, because both types light up and both types run hot: the test is the fuel. The Firebrand's heat is a reflex against being ignored — the trigger is always the loud table: talked over, contradicted, dismissed, and the flame answers before the question is read, at people, in ninety seconds, over by lunch; the Conqueror's heat is a diet — the crowned one does not erupt at slights; the crowned one seeks out the crisis, the argument, the deadline, because stakes are the food, and the war chest's sharpest one-line border, for the shelf and the household: the Firebrand burns when provoked; the Conqueror starves when not — and the second test is the aftermath: the Firebrand apologizes within hours, warm and specific; the Conqueror's apology is vaguer, later, and always about the campaign, never the spark, because there was no spark; the crowned one went hunting — and the war chest's placement of the pair, emblazoned with the care both earn: they are the kingdom's two energies and its two hungers — one starving for attention, one starving for stakes — and the household that confuses them feeds the wrong appetite and wonders why the crowned one is still hungry.

The Triumphant Valkyrie (Volume 34) — the sibling across the catalog's most important border, because both types are made for battle and the world cannot tell them apart at first glance: the difference is the reason for the enlistment. The Valkyrie chooses battle as a sacrament — glory, meaning, the consecrated fight, the crowned one at peace in peacetime because the war is a vocation, not an oxygen line; the Conqueror needs battle to exist — no glory sought, no sacrament, no meaning beyond the metabolism — the crowned one at war with war's absence, and the war chest's cleanest one-line border, tested on every household in the aftermath report: the Valkyrie can come home; the Conqueror cannot — and the second test is the come-down: the Valkyrie after the campaign is satisfied — tired, decorated, restored; the Conqueror after the campaign is starving, and the aftermath report's diagnostic sits in the aftermath every time: watch what the crowned one does when the war ends — the Valkyrie hangs the sword up; the Conqueror starts looking for the next one before the bruises fade — and the war chest's ranking of the pair, emblazoned with respect for both: the Valkyrie is the warrior who fights for something; the Conqueror is the warrior who fights instead of something — and the difference is the whole moral of both volumes, and the unification chapter of this war chest exists, in its entirety, to close that gap.

And the glance file appends the off-season tell, the one nobody runs until this volume hands it over: the Battle-Crowned Conqueror at rest is not resting — watch the type at the picnic, the holiday, the quiet Sunday, and measure the scanning: the eyes on the door of the room the way a sentry watches a treeline, the phone checked against an emergency that has not occurred, the conversation steered, gently, toward whatever in the vicinity is contested (the neighbor's dispute, the office rumor, the game on the television) — and the tell's finding, entered without judgment because the file has read the founding scene: the scanning is not boredom and not rudeness; it is a nervous system on watch — a body drafted at nine and never decommissioned, guarding a picnic against a war that is not coming — and the off-season tell's second layer, which the type's family has felt for decades without naming: the Conqueror, so magnificent at the crisis, is at the picnic the least comfortable person present — the type who runs the emergency better than anyone alive, unable, at the long table, to sit in the sun for two hours without manufacturing a reason to move — and the file's last field note on the glance, entered for the family who keeps inviting the type anyway: the invitation works; the record has charted it across every biography — the Conqueror keeps coming to the quiet Sundays, uncomfortable, scanning, returning — because the off- season, this file will spend ten chapters demonstrating, is not the type's enemy; it is the territory — the country defended and never visited, and the picnic, uncomfortable and unrescued, is the campaign the whole volume has been drafted to declare.

The glance war chest's postscript, the stand-down tell, emblazoned because it is the rarest sighting in the kingdom and the readers who have seen it will vouch for the whole war chest: the Battle-Crowned Conqueror, truly at rest — not between campaigns, but disarmed — occurs a handful of times in any biography, and the tell is unmistakable: the shoulders down, the scanning stopped, the crowned one laughing at something unfunny in the middle of the afternoon, the nervous system audibly, visibly off watch — and the postscript's finding on why the sighting is so rare: the stand-down requires the crowned one to believe, at the level of the body, that the front is held by someone else — an arrangement the first siege never once provided — and the war chest's note for the reader who has witnessed it and spent years trying to re-create it:

the stand-down cannot be manufactured back (the crowned one drafts even the relaxation, and the war chest has watched the scheduled spa day run like a supply operation) — the sighting occurs only when the crowned one forgets to keep watch, which requires a room the crowned one trusts at the level of the body, and the aftermath report's closing line on the glance, emblazoned as a standing order for that room: do not tell the crowned one they are relaxed — the telling re-arms the watch; just hold the quiet, and let the rarest thing in the war chest keep happening.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io