SAMPLE

The Hot-Headed Firebrand

The Personality That Burns First and Thinks Later

Aiman Sterling

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Buy the full book:

Carousell

Contents

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Hot-Headed Firebrand at a Glance

Chapter 2: The Core — The Outburst That Worked

Chapter 3: The Instrument — The Flashpoint

Chapter 4: The Craft — Passion as Reflex

Chapter 5: The Cost: The Ledger of the Burned Life

Chapter 6: The Dark Side: Scorching the Village to Save It

Chapter 8: The Hot-Headed Firebrand in Love and Friendship

Chapter 9: The Matchups — Companions, Rivals, and the Other Types

Afterword

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

You know this person, or you are this person. The colleague whose Monday-morning email is already a three-alarm reply-all before the coffee has finished brewing — wrong, this is wrong, fix it NOW, four exclamation points, a paragraph of heat written in ninety seconds that will cost the type six weeks of quiet repair; the father whose voice fills the kitchen at the first C on the report card, heat in the first degree, love in the first degree, arriving at full temperature before the child has said one sentence in her own defense — and the child who has learned, the file marks this early, to bring the bad news in writing; the friend whose toasts are legendary and whose fights are legend, whose laughter is the loudest in every room and whose exits have slammed more doors than the record can count; the neighbor who screamed at the moving truck in the loading zone and then, the same afternoon, helped carry the sofa up four flights, and meant both hours completely — and the file's opening paradox, held for the whole book, is that neither hour was an act: the record's finding is that the Firebrand's heat is the most honest emotion in the catalog, the least performed, the least calculated, and simultaneously the least examined — the flame answers before the question is read, and the conviction arrives instantly and at full volume, and the type will tell you, with the disarming candor that is their signature, what? I just said what everyone was thinking — and the record's gentle, devastating finding: no one else was thinking it, because everyone else was thinking.

This is a case file on the Hot-Headed Firebrand: the personality that burns first and thinks later.

The founding scene is the outburst that worked — and the file finds it in every case, because it is the only founding scene in this catalog that the type remembers with pride: the child the room talked over, the middle child of a loud table, the small kid at the big school, the quiet one in the loud family — until the afternoon the temper arrived: the tantrum that cleared the restaurant, the outburst that ended the argument the type was losing, the thrown toy that stopped the teasing forever — and the payoff, immediate, delicious, never once interrogated since: the room moved; the taunts stopped; the sibling looked scared; the adult who never listened was suddenly standing at the door; the heat worked, and the file's founding finding, which the whole book turns on: the type discovered, in one afternoon, the only tool that had ever paid — ignition before inspection — and has been reaching for it, reflexively, honestly, catastrophically, for the whole life since.

And the file will honor what deserves honoring, because the record earns it and the ledger demands it: this is the catalog's most alive personality. The conviction that cannot wait; the courage that arrives before the fear does; the room moved, the injustice challenged, the boring meeting set on fire by one honest sentence everyone else was too polite or too afraid to say — the Firebrand says it, and half the room privately agrees, and the record books those rescues in full: the bully confronted, the bad decision challenged, the party saved, the cause ignited. The type's gift is heat at speed — a warmth and energy the other types study and cannot manufacture — and the file's honest ledger entry: much of what the Firebrand set on fire needed burning, and the world is quietly better for the smoke.

But the flaw is built into the same flame, and the ledger audits it in the same ink: heat that arrives before inspection cannot choose its fuel — the ally melted in the same pass as the obstacle; the argument won and the meeting lost; the apology as regular ritual, performed with real remorse and filed, by the recipients, as weather; the reputation calcifying — brilliant, but difficult — until the word but is the most expensive conjunction in the type's career; and the record's central finding, uniform across every case: the Firebrand's flame is indiscriminate by design — it was built to clear a room, and it does not stop to ask who is standing in it — and the type's saddest arithmetic, discovered late or never: the same fire that lights the road is the fire that burns the bridges along it, and the flame, unchecked, eventually guards a clearing the type cleared themselves, alone in it, still hot, still right, still talking.

And the shadow: scorching the village to save it — the pattern repeated because it was never examined: the jobs the type leaves at maximum flame and re-tells as the place was dysfunctional anyway; the friendships that end on the same night the argument ends, never repaired because the apology was performed and the bridge was already gone; the marriage that becomes a weather system — check the barometer before speaking, check it before good news, check it before asking for anything — the household organized around one member's climate; and the record's quietest entry, which the file holds up as the shadow's whole signature: the people the type burned and never noticed — the assistants, the juniors, the friends-of-friends who met the flame once, once was enough, and drifted, and the Firebrand genuinely, honestly, never knew — because the flame never turns around to see what it burned; turning around is inspection, and inspection was never part of the ignition.

And the growth: the flame banked — and the file is precise, because this is the growth path the type fears most and needs most: not the fire out; the fire timed — the same heat, aimed, scheduled, occasionally withheld on purpose, deployed at problems instead of at people, and the record's central discovery, which the whole engine rests on: the flame was never the flaw; the speed was — the heat arrived before the question was read, and the question, given ninety seconds, changes the aim — and the mature Firebrand in the record is not calm; the mature Firebrand is hot on purpose — the flame arriving when it is wanted, at the volume it is wanted, in the direction it is needed, and held back, deliberately, teeth gritted, on the afternoons it would have cost the type another clearing.

If you are this type, the book's wager is exact: you are the most honest person in the room and the most expensive, and the record's arithmetic is on the table — the outburst paid once, in the founding scene, at age nine, and has been charging you retail ever since: every relationship, every job, every reputation carrying the founding afternoon's interest; the file's question, carried through all ten chapters and posed plainly here so you can rehearse flinching at it: what did the fire think it was defending? — because the record's answer, in every case, is not the cause the type lit the match for; the fire defends the child nobody listened to — the small voice at the loud table — and the flame has been shouting at rooms ever since, convinced that being ignored is the same thing as being annihilated, which it was, once, and is not, and has not been for decades.

If you love one, the instruction is precise and counterintuitive: do not match the heat — the Firebrand's flame feeds on fuel, and your heat reads as a fresh argument; and do not retreat — retreat confirms the founding scene, the room emptying again, the being ignored; the instruction that works, and the record has tested it: stay, low and slow, and name the thing underneath — you're not angry about the truck; what happened today? — because the Firebrand's rage is almost always a siren, and the fire is the only alarm the type has, and the person who learns to read the siren becomes the one room the type has ever stopped burning.

Turn the page. The Firebrand is still out there — lighting the cause, carrying the sofa, apologizing twice a month with real tears, saying in ninety seconds what the meeting spent an hour avoiding — and the file's promise is the record's plainest: the flame was always the gift; the timing was always the wound; and the heat, banked and aimed, is the same heat that clears the path — it just learns, in the end, to check who is standing on it.

A note on the file's temperature before the ignition begins, because this portrait will run hotter than any volume on the shelf, and the record owes the reader the furnace's disclosure: the pages ahead are kept, deliberately, at the type's own flame level — the outburst, so effective, credited at its full clearing power; the heat, so costly, entered at its honest scorch radius; the apology, so ritual, documented at its true frequency — because a portrait of the Hot-Headed Firebrand at the archivist's cool register would be a portrait of the ash, not the fire — and the reader who is this type should be told, at the first spark, the finding the record verified in every biography and the rooms, so busy bracing, never once said plainly: the flame was always the loyalty's delivery system — the heat, so alarming, arriving exclusively on behalf of things the type loves (the person, so defended; the wrong, so answered; the argument, so entered because someone had to) — and the whole case, when the growth chapter banks the flame, will not ask the Firebrand to cool (the record would sooner snuff its own pilot light) — it will ask the question the ignition, so fast, has never once permitted: what was the question, before I answered it? — which is, the file can disclose, the only question in the catalog the type has been too on fire to ask — and the whole book is the three seconds it takes.

And the file's door note to the second reader — the one who loves a Firebrand, has been scorched at the edges more than once, and has sometimes wondered whether the heat was aimed at you: the portrait ahead will run the furnace honestly — the fuse audit, the ash column, the village census — and the file owes you its own finding at the door, before the love chapter hands you the forecast: the flame was never aimed at you, and it was never random — the heat, so loyal, fires on the sparks the founding scene installed, and your presence in the blast radius was proximity, not target — and the record's instruction, held out with both hands because the household practice assigns you one line: the flag (raised when the spark lands: 'is this the loud table?') is the beat the type's fuse never learned to hold — and the answer, the grown households all confirm, is always no — and the flame, at that one word, banks: which is, the file notes, the whole growth chapter, delivered at the kitchen counter, in three seconds, for the price of one question.

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Hot-Headed Firebrand at a Glance

The file opens on the manner, because the manner arrives before anything else in the room does: the heat at flashpoint — the visible temperature change, the voice up half an octave and ten decibels, the hands already moving; the instant conviction, total and loud, on any subject within reach, delivered with the confidence the other types need three years of study to counterfeit; the interruption that is not rudeness exactly — the file marks it precisely: it is urgency; the Firebrand has finished your sentence in their own head, and waiting for your mouth to catch up reads to them as wasting the room's time; the laugh that fills the building; the loyalty that arrives at speed and at volume — the type will be offended on your behalf before you have finished describing the insult, and will start the war your cause never asked for; and the apology, the manner's signature instrument and the file gives it its full length: real, warm, unsparing, often excellent — I was wrong, I'm sorry, that was out of line — delivered within hours, sometimes with flowers, sometimes with tears, always with complete sincerity — and always again next month, because the apology is the ritual that closes the incident and has never once addressed the pattern, and the type's shorthand, collected across every case in the record, and the file lets the burnees have the last word of the manner, because they are the only witnesses positioned correctly to see it: the flash is honest and the apology is honest and the promise is honest, and none of the three has ever once changed anything.

The founding scene is the outburst that worked, and the file finds it the way it finds all its founding scenes — by the payoff — and this type's payoff is unique in the catalog: the type remembers it fondly. The scene, uniform in every record: the child nobody listened to — the loud family's quiet one, the middle seat at a big table, the small kid, the talker-over, the invisible — until the afternoon the heat arrived: the tantrum that stopped the restaurant, the eruption that ended the argument, the balled fist or the thrown cup or the scream that made the whole table turn around — and the world's first full attention, arriving all at once, deliciously, at the exact moment of the explosion.

The file marks what the scene taught, because it is the engine's whole curriculum compressed into one afternoon: heat works; patience had never worked; the room that ignored me at room temperature cannot ignore me at five hundred degrees — and the conviction that follows is the type's private constitution, never spoken, never examined, and the record's most expensive sentence: being ignored is dying, and the fire is the only thing that has ever made the room turn around — and the file's note, held for ten chapters: the type is not wrong about the heat's power; the type has never once checked whether the room's turning-around was toward them, and the record's burnees, questioned in adulthood, report the same first impression, at the first explosion, age nine or eleven or fifteen: I was never looking at the face; I was looking at the fire; I don't actually know what the face was doing.

The file keeps five photographs, and the album, read correctly, is the engine's autobiography. In the first, the loud table — the family where volume was currency, where the sibling was funnier and the parent was louder and the child's ordinary voice, tested at ordinary volume, simply lost, over and over, for years; and the file's finding on the first photograph, uniform and quiet: no Firebrand in the record was born into a listening house; the temper was forged in a room that did not hear the small voice, and the flame was the only sentence the table could not talk over.

In the second, the discovery — the explosion, the restaurant, the silence, the turning around, the first full attention of the type's life — and the file notes the discovery's terrible efficiency: it took one outburst to teach what nine years of patience had failed to earn. In the third, the label — the adults convening, gravely, around the new behavior: hot-headed; a temper; he gets that from his uncle; she's a firecracker — and the file marks the label the way the catalog's albums always mark the childhood awards: the cage arrived with a nickname, and the nickname was fond, and the type has worn it, mostly fondly, ever since — the founding scene followed by a christening, and the record's dry note: no one in the scene asked what the fire was for; everyone asked only how to survive it.

In the fourth, the apology — the child, twelve, dissolved in real remorse after burning a friend, discovering the second half of the grammar: the explosion costs, and the repair works, and the repair became part of the pattern — the file marks it plainly: the type learned young that bridges can be rebuilt in a week, and spent a lifetime concluding, from that week, that burning them is affordable; the record's finding: some bridges were rebuilt, and the type never audited which. And in the fifth, the photograph the file keeps last because it is the one the type never develops: the room after — the friend who didn't come back; the sibling who learned to deliver bad news in writing; the parent who started announcing moods at the door like a weather service — and the child, alone in the clearing the fire made, warm, attended, entirely unsure why the room stayed empty once the heat went out — the album's caption says plainly what the cost chapters will audit: the fire cleared the room twice — once of the argument, and once of the people.

Energy: total, instant, and contagious — the file describes it as the room's thermostat jumping nine degrees in one sentence; the type's arrival is a weather event, and the record's rooms report the same split: the best energy in the building, and we check the forecast before we invite it.

Ambition: the moved room — not the throne, not the ledger: the world visibly responding; the type's ambition is the founding scene's, permanently: rooms that turn around.

Vanity structure: the vanity is located in the honesty — the type's secret pride, kept where the heart keeps it, is the sentence rehearsed for every court: I say what everyone is thinking; I'm the only one who says what everyone is thinking — and the file's finding, entered with care: it is true about half the time, which is the most dangerous possible percentage, because it is true often enough to justify the flame and false often enough to burn the room.

Loyalty: instant, loud, and total — the type defends friends before the facts arrive, adopts causes at first hearing, and will die on any hill a loved one was insulted on — and the record's finding cuts both ways: no type in the catalog is quicker to stand up for you, and no type is quicker to stand up at you when the loyalty curdles.

Weakness: the flashpoint — the ninety seconds between ignition and thought; the record's arithmetic, entered as the type's whole handicap: the Firebrand's conclusions are at their loudest at the exact moment they are at their least examined, and the world has learned to discount the type's first paragraph of every argument, which the type experiences, with perfect accuracy, as being ignored — and the file marks the loop with the dry ink it saves for engines: the wound is relived at every discount, and the flame is lit again, and the room turns around again, and nothing about the table has changed since age nine.

Unspoken need: to be heard at room temperature — for one authorized person to receive the type's ordinary voice at ordinary volume, without the fire, and still turn around — the need held under every explosion for the entire loud life, and the record's finding on why it is never spoken: to ask for it would mean admitting the flame was compensation, and the flame being compensation would mean the founding scene's constitution — heat works — was built on the one afternoon a child was desperate, which is exactly where it was built, and the file enters it plainly, because the growth chapter will need it: the type's deepest terror is the empty room at room temperature; the type has never once risked finding out whether the room would turn around anyway.

At the meeting, the type is the most valuable person in the room and the most expensive: the one honest sentence that ends the polite drift — this plan is broken and we all know it — often correct, often needed, occasionally the rescue the project remembers; and, in the same pass, the sentence that ends the alliance: the truth delivered at flame temperature melts the presenter with the presentation, and the file's finding on the aftermath, uniform: the content survives — the plan is fixed, and the fix is the Firebrand's — and the relationship does not, and the type books the fix and never audits the melt, because the audit is inspection, and the record's burnees' testimony, same in every case: they were right; they were right in a way that cost us two members; and they have no idea.

In a queue, in traffic, at the counter, the type is the record's clearest exhibit: the flashpoint against the anonymous world — the parking war, the checkout line, the customer-service runaround, the neighbor's noise — engaged at full volume in ninety seconds, with the total conviction of a barrister and the aim of a howitzer; and the file marks the outcome's asymmetry, which is the situation's whole lesson: against strangers, the heat works — the line moves, the refund arrives, the volume drops, the world has turned around one more time — and the reinforcement is total and invisible: the flame was rewarded again, and the type concludes, again, heat works; and the file's note on the receipt: the refund was already owed, the manager was already coming, the line was about to move; the record cannot prove the flame was necessary in a single anonymous encounter — it can prove the practice made the type dangerous at home, because the flame does not distinguish audiences, and the spouse and the junior colleague receive, at dinner, the temperature the parking lot paid for.

At the good news of another, the type is the record's most complicated guest: the congratulations arrive instantly, warmly, loudly — the type's generosity is real and the file enters it in full: the first to toast, the loudest cheer, the party genuinely improved — and the flashpoint, the file finds it in every case and marks it as the type's tenderest trigger: the moment the attention leaves the room — the toast that goes on one sentence too long about somebody else's award, the birthday that becomes, somehow, a story about the type's own — and the file's finding, held with the care the scene deserves: the slippage is not vanity; it is the founding scene's reflex — a room that is paying attention to someone else is, in the type's nervous system, a room that is not turning around, and the flame arrives, in its tenderest and most disastrous form, as a bid to get the room back, and the record's burnees' sentence on the birthday that wasn't theirs, delivered with real sorrow: they weren't jealous of the achievement; they were jealous of the attention; and that's somehow sadder, and harder to say.

On being contradicted, the type is the catalog's fastest escalation and its fastest learner's paradox: the contradiction is, to this nervous system, the loud table again — the small voice overridden — and the flame arrives before the contradiction has finished loading; the volume doubles; the interruption becomes total; the argument's original subject is abandoned, forgotten, and lost, within ninety seconds, in favor of the argument's actual subject, which the type has never once noticed was the real one: you are not listening to me — and the file's note on the note: the type contradicts others freely, instantly, all day — and receives contradiction as an act of war; and the asymmetry is the founding scene's, permanently installed: the fire is free speech; the fire received is annihilation, and the record's finding on the fights the type wins loudly and loses entirely: they are all the same fight, and it was lost once, at a table, at age nine, and has been re-litigated at volume in every room since.

At the apology, the type is magnificent, and the file gives the situation its full length because it is the book's hinge: the remorse is total and real — no deflection left standing, no but, no you have to understand; the burn named as a burn, the flower or the tears or the handwritten note, the voice breaking on I'm sorry, that was out of line — and the burnees' testimony, uniform and aching, is the hinge's other leaf: it was the best apology I've ever received; it was the fourth one that year; I have them all memorized — and the file's finding on the ritual, which the growth chapter takes up at the threshold: the apology repairs the incident with complete sincerity and repairs the pattern not at all, because the pattern does not live in the incident; the pattern lives in the ninety seconds before it, and the type has never once been asked, in the aftermath, the question that ends it: what did the fire think it was defending?

The Simmering Berserker (Volume 20) — the nearest neighbor and the border the file patrols most carefully, because the two types are the catalog's two temperaments and the world files them together: the test is the fuse. The Berserker simmers — weeks of it, the grievance banked, the ledger kept, the pressure rising in private until the explosion arrives with accumulated interest and takes the relationship with it; the Firebrand flashes — ninety seconds, the heat total and instant, the grievance spoken the moment it is felt, the explosion over by lunch, the relationship often intact because the Firebrand's heat, unlike the Berserker's, carries no deposits — and the second test, sharper, is the apology: the Firebrand apologizes within hours and means it; the Berserker arrives at the apology months late or never, and the file's cleanest one-line border, for the shelf and the household: the Berserker's temper is a slow bomb under the relationship; the Firebrand's temper is weather over it — the Berserker takes the house; the Firebrand takes the afternoon — and the household's practical arithmetic, entered in both volumes: weather you can forecast; bombs you cannot, and the file's placement of the pair, gently: the Firebrand is the easier type to love and the harder type to fear, and the Berserker is the reverse, and the world's confusion of the two is the reason the Firebrand's apology works: it is the wrong file, drawn every time.

The Silent Menace (Volume 59) — the other room-clearer, and the confusion is instructive because both types clear every room they enter: the difference is the mechanism and the intent. The Menace installs cold — a strategy, aimed, calculated, the temperature dropped deliberately and held indefinitely, the discomfort engineered to control; the Firebrand generates heat — a reflex, unaimed, unexamined, the temperature raised before the thought has loaded and gone by evening — and the file's placement, entered with the care both types earn: the Menace's cold is a weapon; the Firebrand's heat is an alarm; the Menace chooses the room's suffering; the Firebrand is the room's suffering, and suffers it too, and apologizes for it — and the file's one-line border for the household: live with the Menace and you learn to watch what you say; live with the Firebrand and you learn to watch the forecast — and the difference is the whole moral of both volumes: one temperature is chosen and one is not, and the record ranks them accordingly, a thousand miles apart, on the one axis that matters in this catalog: intent — the Firebrand can be grown; the Menace must be managed; and the growth chapter of this file exists, in large part, because the Menace's never could.

And the glance file appends the fuse audit, the one that reads the ignition at the resolution the room never clocks: the Firebrand, so instant at the flashpoint, is charted by the file across every biography in the seconds between the spark and the flame — and the finding is the glance chapter's most honest entry: the fuse, so famously short, is not short at all — the file has timed it: the delay, so invisible, runs a full beat longer than the room believes (the spark, landing; the beat, passing — almost long enough for a question — and the flame, arriving anyway) — and the audit's honest layer, which the type has never once been shown: the beat is the unasked question's last chance (the three seconds where the founding scene's arithmetic is checked, silently, against the present room: is this the loud table? — and the answer, so rushed, arriving as yes when it is usually no) — and the fuse audit's practical reading, for the reader who has watched this type detonate at a misunderstanding and mourned the crater: the crater was an honest mistake at three seconds' depth — the flame, so loyal, answering a question that was never read — and the glance file's last field note, entered with the respect the heat has earned from every path it has cleared: the beat, lengthened by one second, is the whole growth chapter — and the file, the record notes, has charted it: the Firebrand who holds the flame through the second beat, in the grown cases, still fires — at what was actually said — and the crater, at that depth, is always the right size.

The glance file's postscript, the warm-up tell — the reading that separates the genuine Firebrand from every cheap Menace in the world's rings: the type, so explosive at the flashpoint, is charted by the file across every biography in the cold hours — and the finding is the glance chapter's most honest: the genuine Firebrand, so hot in the eruption, runs the catalog's warmest baseline (the file has taken the temperature: the kindness, so documented, in the flame's off hours — the neighbor's porch, so shoveled; the stranger's crisis, so entered without hesitation; the loyalty, so total, that the crater's witnesses keep testifying to it) — and the Menace never does (the cold between eruptions, so charted, is the difference: the cruelty as baseline, the heat as nature) — and the tell's practical reading, for the reader who has met this type's crater and wondered which file they were reading: check the warm-up — the flame, the record notes, is loyal in its base state; the Menace is loyal to nothing but the heat — and the growth chapter, the file has held it plainly all along, exists because the Firebrand can be grown, and it is the warm-up, every grown case confirms, that proves the flame was always worth the banking.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io

Read the rest

THE HOT-HEADED FIREBRAND

The full book continues past this sample.

Get it here:
https://ko-fi.com/s/be5582e7c2

Pay what you want, S$1.90 or more. No account needed. Instant PDF + EPUB.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Aiman Sterling is the author of The Archetype Series -- a library of personality portraits drawn the way literature draws characters: the great types of human temperament, recognized at a glance, understood in depth, and followed from childhood wound to mature strength.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Aiman Sterling is the author of The Archetype Series -- a library of personality portraits drawn the way literature draws characters: the great types of human temperament, recognized at a glance, understood in depth, and followed from childhood wound to mature strength.