SAMPLE

Banking, Waqf, and Modern Wealth: The Book's Own Economy

How Interest Was Abolished, Trade Was Kept, and Wealth Was Taught to Circulate

Aira Aurora

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Contents

Disclaimer

Chapter 1: The Wealth-Frame — Property as a Trust

Chapter 2: The Riba-Prohibition — The Interest-Economy Abolished

Chapter 3: The Trade-Permission — Bay' Versus Riba

Chapter 4: Profit-and-Risk — The Mudarabah-Root

Chapter 5: The Written Contract — The Longest Verse in the Book

Chapter 6: The Deposit-Economy — The Amanah

Chapter 7: The Waqf — The Charity That Outlives the Giver

Chapter 8: Saving Versus Hoarding — The Kanz-Warning

Chapter 9: The Zakat — The Standing Purification

Chapter 10: The Circulation-Frame — The Wealth That Must Move

Chapter 11: The Modern Banking File — The Instruments Tested at the Book

Chapter 12: The Wealth's Yield — The Hereafter-Account

Chapter 13: The Rivalry-Desk — The Takathur-Weather of the Modern Accumulation

Chapter 14: The Garden-Owners' Vow-Desk — The No-Poor Harvest and Its Blight

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Wealth-Frame — Property as a Trust

The Book's economics begins with a custody-papers: "Believe in Allah and His Messenger, and spend from that over which He has made you successors" (57:7) — the istikhlaf-file, the whole property-law compressed into one clause. The wealth is not owned in the absolute sense the modern ledger implies; it is held. The human is a khalifah over the estate — a successor-administrator whose title is real (the Book never abolishishes property; the tenth-command file protects it) but whose tenure is conditional (the spend-clause is attached to the holding-clause in the same breath).

The scholars' standing note on the frame (the fiqh's own summary, labeled): the wealth has three claims standing on it simultaneously — the holder's own needs (the Book's own permission: "eat and drink, but do not be excessive" — 7:31), the family's maintenance (the tradition's nafaqah-law, labeled), and the poor's standing right (70:24-25's claimed-share register: "and those in whose wealth there is a recognized right for the petitioner and the deprived"). The modern single-owner file — my money, my choice — is corrected at the verse's own grammar: the wealth in which "there is a right" for others is not a metaphor's wealth but the very wealth in the account, and the right is not a suggestion's tone but a haqq — the same word the Book uses for truth itself.

The frame's own philosophy is legislated at 28:77 — the verse the tradition calls the just-middle's charter (the fiqh's own summary, labeled), and the one text every later Islamic economist quotes first: "Seek, by means of what Allah has given you, the home of the Hereafter — and do not forget your share of the worldly life; and do good as Allah has done good to you, and do not seek corruption in the land." The four clauses hold the whole economy: the wealth is a means with a direction (the Hereafter as the address), a share is owed to this world (the ascetic-economy refused as firmly as the hedonist-economy), the prosperity is itself a test (the ihsan-economy: goodness done with the same generosity it was given), and the corruption-clause closes the gate (the wealth's power never used to corrupt the land it grew in).

The scholars' synthesis at the verse (labeled): the Book legislates neither poverty nor luxury — it legislates direction. The same dinar can be trust or corrosion depending on the address written on it; and the modern economy's own deepest question — what is money for? — is answered at the verse's own level: the wealth is for the Hereafter's home, spent through this world's needs, never through this world's corruptions.

The frame ends where the Book's eschatology begins: the wealth is a trial by design — "And know that your properties and your children are a trial, and that with Allah is a great reward" (8:28) — the imtihan-file, the estate itself listed among the Book's own exam-papers, and the trial's own logic stated openly at 64:15: "Your wealth and your children are but a trial — and Allah has with Him a great reward." The modern mind calls capital a store of value; the Book calls it a question with a due date. The whole book that follows is the answer-key: how the wealth is earned (trade, not riba), how it is documented (written, witnessed), how it is held (saved, not hoarded), how it moves (zakat, waqf, circulation), and how it is finally answered for (the multiplication-account of 2:261 — where the wealth that flowed is honored seven hundred to one, and the wealth that froze is heated in the fire of 9:34-35's own closing image).

Before the frame's duties comes the frame's own permission: the wealth itself is lawful — "Say: who has forbidden the adornment of Allah which He has brought out for His servants, and the good things of provision?" (7:32) — the adornment-file, the Book's own anti-ascetic clause: the gold, the silk, the good things are named as Allah's own gifts "for His servants," and the forbid-ban is aimed at the forbidder. The tradition's standing note at the verse (labeled): the Book legislates a wealthy piety, not a poor one — the frame of Chapter 1 (custody, balance, trial) is written over property the Book has already blessed, and the whole economy-file that follows governs a permitted fortune, never abolishes it.

And the provision's own breadth closes the permission: "And He subjected to you whatever is in the heavens and whatever is on the earth — all from Him" (45:13) — the taskhir-file, the cosmos itself leased to the human trustee: the wealth the Book spends so many verses regulating is the same wealth the Book spends other verses handing over.

The custody-frame's own hardest case is the estate held for the voiceless: "And give the orphans their property, and do not exchange the bad for the good, and do not consume their property into your own — indeed that is a great sin" (4:2) — the yatim-file, the Book's own trust-law for the smallest account-holder, and the clause's own precision reads like a modern fiduciary-code: the substitution-prohibition (the bad for the good — the guardian's own temptation, the estate's best fields swapped for the guardian's worst, a fraud-file the Book names before the surveyor exists), the merger-ban (the property absorbed into the guardian's own), and the sin-register itself: a great sin — the estate-file ranked with the majors.

And the warning's own psychology is legislated at 4:9-10 in two of the Book's own most piercing registers: "And let them fear who, if they left behind weak offspring, would be afraid for them — so let them fear Allah and speak rightly"

— the empathy-clause, the guardian ordered to feel his own death-bed file before touching the orphan's ledger; and then the fire-image: "Indeed those who consume the property of orphans unjustly are only consuming fire into their bellies, and they will burn in a Blaze" — the guardian-embezzlement written as internal combustion, the stolen estate eaten as flame (the same heat-register the kanz-file of Chapter 8 will use for the frozen fortune — the Book's two wealth-sins, the eaten orphan-trust and the hoarded treasure, sharing the one furnace).

The scholars' standing synthesis at the orphan-file (labeled): the trust-economy of the whole Book begins at its weakest client — the orphan-estate is the amanah-case by which every other deposit is calibrated (4:58's "render trusts to whom they are due" descending at 4:2's specific bench), and the modern fiduciary's own whole profession (the trustee, the executor, the custodian of the minor's account — the extension is the fiqh's, labeled) is the verse's own grandchildren: every protected estate a fulfillment of 4:2, and every looted one the 4:10-fire still burning in the only belly that lit it.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io