SAMPLE

Jihad: The Striving in the Cause

The Word the Quran Uses — Its Full Meaning, Its Rules, Its Ranks, and Its Reward

Aira Aurora

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Contents

Disclaimer

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Word Itself — What Jihaad Means

Chapter 2: The Cause — Fi Sabilillah

Chapter 3: The Inner Striving — The Struggle Within

Chapter 4: The Striving of Wealth and Word

Chapter 5: The Permission — When Fighting Was Commanded

Chapter 6: The Ethics of Combat — The Quran's Own Rules

Chapter 7: The Ranks — The Strivers' Grading

Chapter 8: The Excuses — The Couch Answered

Chapter 9: The Test — Why Striving Is Prescribed

Chapter 10: The Support — Whose Help and How

Chapter 11: The Misuse — Both Thefts

Chapter 12: The Reward

Chapter 13: The Odds-Doctrine — Twenty Over Two Hundred

Chapter 14: The Self-Seller and the Striving-Wealth — The Mujahid's Portfolio

Frequently Asked Questions

Glossary

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

No word of the Quran is more famous today, and none is less read. Jihad — quoted by those who fear it and by those who weaponize it — is almost never quoted from the Quran itself: its verb's three usages, its cause's definition, its ethics' rules, its ranks' grading, its excuses' answers, and its reward's description all live in the Book, unread by both parties to the argument.

This book reads it. The method is the series' method: the verses, in context, with the tradition labeled as tradition and nothing invented.

The reading runs in three arcs. First, the word: what jihaad actually means in the Quran's own usage — the striving of parents to mislead (29:8), the striving with the Quran itself (25:52), the striving with wealth and lives (61:11) — and the cause (fi sabilillah) that defines the striving's direction (Chapters 1-2). Second, the forms: the inner struggle (Chapter 3), the giving and the speaking (Chapter 4), the fighting that the Quran permits and prescribes with its exact conditions (Chapters 5-6), and the grading of those who answer at different levels (Chapter 7). Third, the human story: the excuses the couches produced and the Quran's answers (Chapter 8), the testing's purpose (Chapter 9), the help's source (Chapter 10), the two modern thefts of the word — the extremist's and the denier's — answered from the text (Chapter 11), and the reward the whole command stands on (Chapter 12).

A word before the first chapter, because this book will be read by the worried: the Quran's own ethics of combat — "do not transgress" (2:190), "if they incline to peace, incline to it" (8:61), the protection of the seeker of safety (9:6), "no compulsion in religion" (2:256) — are not later softenings; they are in the same surahs as the hard verses, often the same passages, and a reader who takes one half without the other has not read either half. This book's commitment is to hold both, because the Book holds both.

One reading-note before the first page: the Quran's verses on fighting were revealed across a decade of real campaigns — Badr, Uhud, the Trench, Hudaybiyyah, Tabuk — and the Book's own method is to speak to the moment while legislating for the ages. The scholars' discipline (labeled where used) reads the verses in their order and their context; the misusers' method reads them out of both. This book follows the scholars, cites the moment, and lets the Book's own guards (the "do not transgress," the "if they cease," the "grant him protection") stand exactly where the Book put them — because a verse's neighbors are part of the verse.

Chapter 1: The Word Itself — What Jihaad Means

Jihaad is a verb before it is a fear: ja-ha-da — to strive, to exert effort to the limit of capacity. The Quran uses the verb's family across a spectrum that politics has flattened, and the Book's own usage is the reader's only safe dictionary:

The striving of misdirection. "And We have enjoined upon man goodness to his parents; but if they strive against you (jahadaaka) to associate with Me that of which you have no knowledge, do not obey them" (29:8; 31:15's parallel). The Quran's first recorded jihad in a family register is the parents' pressure on the believer — the word covers persuasion, pressure, and love deployed wrongly: striving is a force, and the force can be aimed wrong.

The striving of the message. "And do not obey the disbelievers, and strive against them with it (the Quran) with a great striving (jihadan kabira)" (25:52). The Quran itself is called an instrument of jihad — the verse revealed in Makkah, before any fighting existed: the believer's primary striving is with the Book: its recitation, its argument, its patience.

The striving of the whole life. "So strive for Allah with the striving due to Him; He has chosen you and has placed no difficulty upon you in religion" (22:78). The command's object is Allah, and the striving's measure is "due to Him" — the Book's own phrase for a lifetime's total effort, not a campaign's.

The striving with wealth and lives. "Believe in Allah and His Messenger and strive with your wealth and your lives" (61:11); "Go forth, light and heavy, and strive with your wealth and your lives in the cause of Allah" (9:41). The usage that includes fighting — and the only usage the modern argument notices. It is one register of the verb, not the verb's whole body.

The Quran never leaves jihaad alone; the verb travels with the words that define its atmosphere: "with your wealth and your lives" (61:11, 4:95) — the striving is a payment, not a mood; "and be patient" (the pairing of striving and patience throughout: 16:110's "then strove and were patient"); "in the cause of Allah" (fi sabilillah — the next chapter's subject) — the striving is aimed; "and do not fear the blame of a blamer" (5:54's frame of the striving believer) — the striving is public and costly.

And the Book's severest sentence about the word is its quietest: "And whoever strives — strives only for himself; indeed Allah is free of need of the worlds" (29:6-7: "whoever strives, strives for himself; indeed Allah is Rich of the worlds"). The striving's beneficiary is the striver: the command needs nothing; the striver needs the command.

The word's Quranic meaning, then, before any chapter of fighting: jihaad is the religion's total effort — of the tongue (25:52), of the heart (the next chapter), of the wealth, of the life (61:11) — aimed at the cause (Chapter 2), graded by the Book (Chapter 7), tested by events (Chapter 9), and rewarded (Chapter 12). The fighting verses (Chapters 5-6) are one room in the house; the modern argument lives in the doorway, shouting about the room, never entering the house.

The next chapters enter the house in the Book's own order: first the cause that defines all the striving — then the rooms.

The Book installs the striving as the believer's permanent mode, not a campaign's phase: "So strive for Allah with the striving due to Him" (22:78) — and the same verse names the striving's religion-content ("He has named you Muslims" — the identity given in the striving's verse) and removes the excuse of scale ("He has placed no difficulty upon you"). The scholars read 22:78's pairing as the word's final scope: the striving is the deen lived at full exertion — in Makkah's patience, in Madinah's defense, in every era's da'wah, giving, and self-mastery — and the believer who asks "is jihad still relevant?" has read the verb as a noun and the noun as a war, while the Book wrote a verb and aimed it at a whole life.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io