SAMPLE

The Eternal Suitor

The Personality That Never Stops Courting

Aiman Sterling

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Contents

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Eternal Suitor at a Glance

Chapter 2: The Core — Courtship as Identity

Chapter 3: The Instrument — The Courtship

Chapter 4: The Craft — The Suitor's Craft

Chapter 5: The Cost: Arrival, Peace, the Person Behind the Project

Chapter 6: The Dark Side: The Beloved as Project

Chapter 7: The Eternal Suitor at Work — Career, Teams, and the Boss Relationship

Chapter 8: The Eternal Suitor in Love and Friendship

Chapter 9: The Matchups — Companions, Rivals, and the Other Types

Chapter 10: The Art Applied to Staying — the Suitor Who Arrives

Afterword

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

You know this person, or you are this person. The valentine opens on its most romantic exhibit, and the honesty it owes this self runs in both directions, because the world celebrates this one and never quite reaches it — the friend's entry, held with the gratitude the archive has learned to pay this constitution before it says anything else: her letters are framed in my hallway — I am not being rhetorical — the anniversary she staged for my parents' fiftieth is cited at other people's weddings — she has courted her husband for thirty years with a devotion that makes the rest of our marriages look like gym memberships — I have never once seen her in the same room as any of it — the artistry, unmatched, and the residency, not once scheduled.

The partner's entry, entered with the devotion and the one permanent question: I am the most loved person I know — the roses still come — last month he filled the entire house with the flowers from our first date, thirty years, same species — and I am asking you, carefully, as a question I cannot ask him: when does the courtship end and the marriage begin? — I am standing at the door he keeps decorating — the door has been open for nine years — he is, right now, on the porch, composing — the devotion, total, and the arrival, adjourned by art.

And the shock of the type's true history, glimpsed by accident — the account's informant, a childhood neighbor, over the old albums: people think he was born gallant — he was born at the window — the father at the posting, warm in every letter, cold at every table — the toys, better in the window than in the hand — I watched that kid learn it, year by year: the wanting is the good part — and it worked — the wanting never let him down — nobody ever once noticed the house he was building in it had no arrival — just the approach, beautiful, forever — the porch, built at eight, and the porch, thirty years on, still lit, and nobody, including the Suitor, has ever once come in from it.

And the question the archive keeps beside the account from the first page: is the eternal courtship the valentine's greatest romance or its most postponed home — the beloved at the horizon, and the door, open the whole time?

This is a case file on the Eternal Suitor: the personality that never stops courting.

The founding scene is the pursuit as home, and the billet-doux marks what makes it the shelf's most romantic origin: the distant parent — warm in the letters, cold at the table — and the child, running the only study a longed-for child ever gets to run: the comparison — the wanting, and the having — and the findings: the wanting, bright; the having, flat; the arrival, always the beginning of the spoiling — and the founding discovery, made by a child doing arithmetic in the space between desire and arrival: the wanting never lets you down — the wanted thing, in the hand, always does — and the founding ruling, never once revised: live in the pursuit — arrival is where things go to spoil — and the tryst's verification, run across the whole shelf since: the ruling worked — the younger self who lived in the wanting had the most alive inner weather in the album, spoiler-proof, warm, and portable — and the billet-doux honors it: the pursuit, taken up, houses the self instantly, and the world's great romances, causes, and campaigns are staffed by exactly this constitution, and finish beautifully.

And the clause the ruling never carried, the clause that becomes the account:

the child's arithmetic was correct for one home's catalog of spoiled arrivals — and the adult's chosen ones were never re-tested — the type, at the threshold of the had, reinstates the distance: the yes, received, and the courtship, resumed the next morning — the roses, arriving again, and the beloved, re-horizoned — and the tryst's founding paradox, stated plainly: the art that makes the Suitor the most romantic person alive makes the arrival unlivable — and the type's own life, the files attest, in perfect order except for everything after the yes — and the ripening's whole discovery, arriving ten chapters early so the type can practice standing in it: the art survives the arrival — the Tuesday, at last survived, does not end the romance — it is the romance, finally home.

If you are this self, the minuet's wager is exact: your artistry is the best romance craft on this shelf — the evidence is every letter your beloveds have framed — and the valentine's question, saved through ten chapters and finally asked here, in plain words, so you can practice standing in it: who, exactly, is the courtship for? — because the tryst's answer, in every tryst, is the result the art guards most carefully: the courtship has a subject and no resident — the beloved is the most studied person alive, and has never once had a Tuesday with you — and the strongest thing you will ever do is not a better gesture — it is a plain breakfast, held weekly, unstaged, with the door open and no porch — and the arrival, the valentine has verified, breaks nothing — the art works at arm's length; the roses, it turns out, can come inside.

If you love one, your directive is precise and counterintuitive: do not applaud the porch — the applause funds the renewals — and do not demand the arrival, which is processed as the ending and postpones it further; the instruction that works, and the billet-doux has tested it: love the art and cancel the porch — the Stayer's two lines, both true, in one breath: nobody writes like you — I keep every one — and they don't get answered — the letters get walked to — I'm coming over — old sweater, no flowers — if the poet wants me, the poet can have me in the kitchen — and then keep the Tuesday standing appointment, gently, for years — because the Eternal Suitor has spent a lifetime building the world's most beautiful bridges and never once walking to the far bank, and the growth, the entire file will show, begins the first plain morning that is held — and the roses come too.

Turn the page. The Suitor is still out there — mid-composition, mid- approach, the most romantic person in every room and the only one who never lives in any of them — and the billet-doux's promise is the tryst's plainest: the art was never the enemy — the art is the overture — and the self, once the Tuesday is held and the regard is turned and the getting is savored, becomes what the hall always mistook it for and it never quite was: not the great lover at the door — the great lover inside — the word's whole, old meaning: the approach, kept; the arrival, inhabited; and the courtship, at last, the road instead of the home.

And the valentine opens on the study the archive resisted running, held back until now because the finding embarrassed the researchers who collected it: the follow-up, conducted with the pursued — the ones the Suitor courted and did not win, and the ones who were never courted at all — and the count, run across three cities, is the file's corrective exhibit: the pursued-then-declined remembered the Suitor fondly, decades on, without exception (the archive holds no other makeup with a spotless aftermath — the declined, interviewed, defended the Suitor unprompted: "'you will hear that he was insincere.

He was the most sincere person I ever declined. Nothing I said stopped the flowers, and he was gone the day I said the word, and I mean gone — he has never once made me explain it since" — the retreat, executed with the same artistry as the approach) — and the finding, priced honestly: the craft, so famous for its pursuit, is equally a craft of honor — the Suitor courts the yes and never once courts past the no — and the reader is asked to carry that standard through every chapter that follows, because the file's real subject is not a romantic at all: it is a self that built the world's most beautiful approach and parked, terrified, at the one address it never rehearses — arrival.

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Eternal Suitor at a Glance

Before anything else, the gesture — and the valentine has to begin with the honest first impression, because the style is the type's entire weather and the world's entire misreading of it: the Eternal Suitor arrives with the rose after the wedding — the letter, written after the letter was returned; the serenade, delivered under the wrong decade's window — and the effect on the room, the tryst's most reliable split: half the room undone — the sight of devotion with no expiry is the most moving spectacle in this locket, and the billet-doux has watched rooms go silent at the type's fiftieth- anniversary gesture with the same hush they gave the first — and half the room, the practical half, quietly confused — and their collected question, uniform in each case, the inquiry this whole book will spend ten chapters answering: they already said yes — who, exactly, are you still courting? — and the tryst's founding finding entered in the book's ink the entire book lives in: the Eternal Suitor is the bower of courtship as identity — the beloved pursued with the artistry most people reserve for careers, the romance maintained past every reasonable endpoint — with the second finding riding beside it, the one the entire case turns on: the devotion is real — every gesture, sincere; every letter, meant — and the pursuit, the whole file will show, is not aimed at the beloved: it is aimed at the space between desire and arrival, the only address the type has ever actually lived at — and the inquiry the tryst will spend ten chapters walking toward: what happens to the art the day the door opens?

And the style carries the type's signature gesture, and the billet-doux enters it precisely because it is the diagnostic: the renewal — the courtship, re-upped past every sensible endpoint — the flowers, arriving after the "I do"; the courtship, resumed after the years; the devotion, maintained at the same wattage at year forty as at week four — and the billet-doux's x-ray of the renewal: it is not persistence, exactly, and not inertia — the renewal is residence: the type, at home in the pursuit, renovating it — and the marker within the tell, verified in each case: the gestures, timed to the distance — the letter, better than the conversation; the gift, better in the giving than in the after — and the valentine's dry note: the Suitor's serenades are magnificent and the Suitor's mornings-after are unremarkable — the art, the whole case will show, requires the distance it claims to resent — and nobody, in the billet-doux's whole history, has ever once seen the type inside the arrival for longer than a season.

The file holds one origin for this self, and it is the tryst's most longed-for founding scene, run on a home where the wanting was the warm part: there was a first great wanting — and the billet-doux keeps the particulars various on purpose, because the anatomy is uniform: the distant parent — the father, charming in the letters from the posting and cold at the kitchen table; the mother, warm on the phone from the other house — the child, discovering that the best version of the beloved arrived only at a distance, in the envelope, in the promise, in the almost — and the tableau's second act, the one that founds the bower: the arrival, disappointing — the leave, finally taken: the father, home, and lesser — the promise, delivered, and souring — and the child, running the study the whole life runs on: the window's gift, better than the gift; the promised holiday, better than the holiday — and the discovery, totted up in the space between hoping and holding: the wanting is the good part — the wanting never lets you down — the wanted thing, in the hand, always does — and the ruling, drafted in a child's shorthand and never audited since: live in the pursuit — arrival is where things go to spoil — and the scene's terminal entry, the tryst's most quietly melancholy: the child, at some point, stopped wanting anything gettable — the crushes, chosen unreachably; the dreams, kept safely in progress — and the tryst's line on the founding: the younger self was never taught that arrival could hold — every arrival in the album spoiled — and no one, in the wreckage of the first disappointments, ever asked the question the entire book will ask: what if the next one doesn't spoil?

And the valentine must file the tableau's rider with the delicacy this account demands, because the rider is what converts the gift into the tryst: the founding was real — the distance's warmth, real; the arrival's coldness, real; the child's arithmetic, correct for the home it was made in — the billet-doux refuses the cheap reading that this self merely avoids commitment — and the clause the founding never carried: the ruling was made by a child against one home's spoiling — and the adult arrivals — the ones built with a chosen person, on purpose, with the spoiling declined — were never field-tested, because the self, at the first sign of arrival, reinstates the distance: the gesture, renewed; the beloved, re-promoted to the horizon — and the paradox the archive enters without ornament: the art that makes the Suitor the most romantic person alive renders the arrival unlivable — the pursuit, magnificent at sustaining love across distance, useless at sitting in the kitchen with it — and the valentine's correction, held gently, because it is the account's whole growth: the younger self read the wanting correctly — it is the living tissue; the child's error was making it the sole living tissue — a forgivable verdict at eight, a costly one at forty, and the ripening chapter's whole project: the art, at last, applied to staying.

The album opens as it opens in every case, and this tryst's photographs are its most wistful artifacts: each year holds a single photograph, and it is every time the same one: the younger self, mid-longing — the window seat, the letter in the lap; the fence, the better yard beyond it; the shop window, the toy, regarded from the street — and the tryst's first entry beside the album: the younger self is luminous in every photograph taken at a distance from the thing — the face, at the window, more alive than any face in the album — and the album's most common image of the younger self otherwise: prevented from having — the crush, unspoken; the audition, unattended — and the tryst's quiet audit of the album: the album contains almost no photographs of the younger self holding anything — no presents, opened and used; no trophies, kept — only the approach: the child photographed like a pilgrim, every year of a childhood.

The album's most telling photo is the one the family calls the sad one: the delivered present — the longed-for gift, at last in the child's hands — and the tryst's most delicate finding, verified across every billet-doux: the younger self is not happy in the photograph; the child is finished — the toy, already ordinary; the wanting, grieving quietly behind the eyes — and the most telling detail of all, the one the valentine has learned to check: the next photograph — a week later, the child, at the window again, wanting the next thing — the tryst's gentle correction, entered with the care the album is owed: the younger self's childhood was not deprived — the toys came, eventually — the childhood was sequenced wrong: the wanting, bright; the having, brief; the return to the wanting, relieved — the album, read in order, is a study in a child teaching themselves that possession is the boring part.

And the album closes on the ending the series knows to expect: the younger self already the Suitor — the adolescence organized around the unreachable: the crushes, chosen from the far tables; the letters, written and unsent; the romances, begun only with the departing — and the moment the pursuit became the identity: the tryst's collected scene, uniform across the files: the young Suitor, sixteen, and the first great courtship — the beloved, at a distance, and the months of the pursuit, the most alive months of the childhood: the mixtapes, the letters, the craft — and then the beloved, saying yes — and the tryst's collected detail, uniform across the files, the makeup's whole debut: the young Suitor, receiving the yes, feeling the first adult sorrow the billet-doux has a name for: the grief of arrival — the yes, received; the wanting, ended; the self, suddenly unsure what to do with its hands — and the album's last entry, the founding arithmetic in one image: the younger self, the day after the yes, at the window again — already composing the next pursuit, or, in the cases the billet-doux marks carefully, resuming the pursuit of the same beloved — the roses, arriving again, and the beloved, confused and charmed: you already have me — and the child, sixteen, saying the sentence the entire file will spend ten chapters understanding: that's why — now the real courtship begins.

Energy: romantic, ardent, and distance-fed — the type runs on the space between desire and arrival: the beloved, at the horizon, and the self, lit up like a harbor — and the spec's fine print is the account: the energy has no socket at close range — the beloved, in the room, and the wattage, dipping — the valentine's dry note: the Suitor is the only constitution in this shelf whose brightness can be measured in meters from the beloved, which the world reads as passion and the billet-doux reads as a lamp with a motion sensor pointed the wrong way.

Ambition: the great courtship — and the archive enters it precisely, because it is the shelf's one ambition aimed at a person: the Suitor does not want the throne, the portfolio, the billet-doux — the Suitor wants the pursuit, conducted at artistry — and the difference from every other ambition on this shelf: the self protects the distance over the arrival — the gathered evidence, uniform across the files: the yes, declined once per life, gently, at the wrong moment — and the billet-doux's dry remark: the Suitor's career is the only one in this shelf that has ever turned down its own dream, on purpose, to keep dreaming it.

Vanity structure: light, hidden under the devotion, and real — the mirror is not the person's admirer; the mirror is the front row — the type's self-regard attaches to the artistry: the letter, the finest anyone has received; the gesture, the best in the room's memory — and the valentine's x-ray: under the modesty — and the Suitor is genuinely modest about everything except the craft — there is a small, sturdy pride of the great lover — the type believes, quietly, that courtship is an art and the self is its living master — and the tryst's quiet note: the belief is half right — the art is real — and the mastery, the whole file will show, was never once tested at the only range that matters: after.

Loyalty: to the pursued — the type's loyalties are the great subjects of the art: the beloved, kept for decades; the old beloveds, honored in the type's memory like patron saints — kept forever, no matter what — and the tryst's sharp note: the loyalty's spine is the distance preserved — the deepest bonds this constitution knows are the ones maintained in the not-having — and the type's one breach condition: the settled — the beloved who insists on ordinary cohabitation gets gently, permanently, re- courted instead of joined — the tryst's collected line, uniform in every tryst: let me love you properly — the sentence that has postponed more of the Suitor's arrivals than any schedule.

Weakness: the arrival — the Suitor's whole structure stalls at the sentence: you have me — the possession, arriving, and the makeup's deepest allergy firing: the distance, closing — and the anatomy of the stall: the self, at the threshold of the had, produces the billet-doux's most reliable scene: the renewal — the gesture, escalated; the beloved, re- horizoned — and the tryst's gathered defense, uniform across the files: I just want it to be right — you deserve the whole courtship — the sentence that turns the arrival into the pursuit's next act.

Unspoken need: to arrive and stay alive — the one experience the makeup left out of its own arithmetic: the door, opened, and the self, still lit up on the inside — the wanted thing, in the hand, and not spoiling — and the tryst's central line on the tryst: the Suitor will never voice this need aloud, cannot name it plainly, because the naming would concede the founding was about fear and not about romance — the child's arithmetic, arrival spoils, would need its first revision — and the entire file will spend ten chapters walking toward the line: the art was never the enemy — the art was the refuge — and the arrival, at last, survived, is the only masterpiece the craft was ever building toward.

At a party: the Suitor is the romance of the room — the stranger, met, and pursued to the door: the conversation, conducted like a duel of charm; the follow-up, a letter by Tuesday — and the tryst's tell, sharper under observation: the departure — the Suitor, leaving precisely at the charm's peak — the pursuit, suspended at its best — and the valentine's dry line: everyone at the party met the most romantic person alive, and nobody at the party has ever had breakfast with them.

In a new job: the Suitor is the ardent recruit — the mission, courted: the first months, the most devoted in the building — the craft, applied to the onboarding like a courtship — and the valentine's tell: the year-two dip — the novelty, consumed; the pursuit, needing a new beloved — and the office, split the usual way: the half that fell for the courtship and the half asking why the star recruit suddenly isn't returning anyone's calls.

Under sudden pressure: the Suitor is the campaigner — and the billet- doux gives this constitution its honest due, because it is the account's real gift: the crisis, arriving, and the type, magnificent at the almost — the deal, rescued at the eleventh hour; the patient, rallied by the visit; the cause, funded by the letter that moved the donor — the valentine's verified finding: the Suitor in a crisis of hope is the valentine's best closer — and the marker, sharper under observation: the after — the crisis, resolved, and the Suitor, already gone to the next almost — the won thing, handed to the maintainers — and the valentine's dry remark: the type saves the castle and never once learns to live in it.

In a boring meeting: the Suitor is the poet of the agenda — the dull quarter, narrated like a drama; the stakeholder, courted — and the tryst's tell, the one managers report across every billet-doux: the Suitor, silent for the hour, then delivering the one paragraph that makes the boring thing worth wanting — and the billet-doux's honest note: the paragraph is always genuine, and the paragraph is also the type's whole native land: the making-wanted — the meeting, improved and left, like everything else the type improves.

On holiday: the Suitor is the pilgrim — the destination, chosen for its distance: the far city, courted for months in advance; the restaurant, booked before the flights — and the valentine's sharpest tell: the arrival's evening — the first night, perfect; the second, the type, planning the next trip — and the valentine's dry line: the holiday doesn't relax the Suitor — the holiday is the art in exile — a week of the pursuit, abroad, and the returning flight, and the valentine's note: the only day the Suitor is fully present is the last one, when the trip becomes a letter.

The closest neighbor on the shelf is the Devoted Caregiver (Volume 7) — the constitution that loves by tending — and the mix-up is the world's most common, because both types rank among this shelf's great lovers: the ones whose entire identity is another person. The separation is the range: the Caregiver's devotion is close — the tenderness, administered at arm's length: the soup, the bedside, the tending of actual needs — the valentine's entry: the Caregiver's love is a practice, and the practice requires proximity; the Suitor's devotion is long — the artistry, administered at a distance: the letter, the gesture, the romance — the valentine's entry: the Suitor's love is a courtship, and the courtship requires distance — and the test, the tryst's cleanest, run at the beloved's sick day: the Caregiver, in the room — the tea, made; the pillow, fluffed — the love, manned at close range.

The Suitor, at the door — the flowers, sent; the letter, written from the hallway — the love, broadcast — and the tryst's hinge, entered dry: the Caregiver loves the beloved's needs; the Suitor loves the beloved's horizon — and the whole difference between tending and courting is whether the devotion gets stronger when the door opens or when it closes — which is why the ripening chapter for one is the tending received and, for the other, the door, survived.

The second neighbor is the Radiant Explorer (Volume 85) — the personality that goes to see — and the confusion lives in the shared horizon: both types are the ones oriented at the far thing, the ones the settled neighbors call dreamers — the world's two pilgrims. The separation is the object: the Explorer's horizon is a place — the glacier, the far city, the world's edge: the motion is curiosity, and the arrival is the point; the Suitor's horizon is a person — the beloved, the yes, the romance's edge: the motion is desire, and the arrival is the hazard — and the tryst's telling x-ray: the Explorer's photographs are all of arrivals — the summit, the harbor, the glacier, reached; the Suitor's photographs are all of approaches — the letter, the wrapped gift, the window — and the test, run at the getting there: the Explorer, at the glacier, elated — the far thing, gotten, and better for the getting.

The Suitor, at the yes, grieving quietly — the far thing, gotten, and suddenly ordinary — and the valentine's hinge: the Explorer arrives and moves on; the Suitor moves on to avoid the arriving — and the whole difference between wanderlust and courtship is what the far thing is allowed to do to you when you get it — which is why the ripening paths differ by one letter: the Explorer learns the return, and the Suitor learns the staying.

The third neighbor is the Detached Poet (Volume 87) — the personality that lives above it all — and the confusion is the deepest, because both types are the distant lovers of this locket: the ones who feel the world's beauty from one floor up, the ones whose best relationships are conducted with the world at an angle. The separation is the material of the distance: the Poet's remove is aesthetic — the rooftop, the elevation, the life curated for the view: the distance faces up; the Suitor's remove is romantic — the horizon, the pursuit, the life curated for the wanting: the distance faces across — and the test, the tryst's most decisive, run at the beloved: the Poet, in love, loves the beauty of the loving — the beloved, half raw material; the poem, the point.

The Suitor, in love, loves the beloved — the person, the point; the artistry, half raw material — and the tryst's hinge, entered with the evenness both are owed: the Poet keeps the distance because the view is better; the Suitor keeps the distance because the window is safer — one is elevation, one is armor — and the entire difference between them is what happens when the beloved says yes: the Poet writes the poem, and the Suitor, for the first time in the billet-doux, has nowhere to put the morning — which is why the ripening chapter for one is the descent and, for the other, the arrival.

The signature the hallways keep under glass, opened first because it prices the whole act: the framed letters — the Eternal Suitor, so romantic, is the valentine's most documented makeup — and the evidence, uniform across the bower: the letter, written, always (the friend's transcript, held verbatim: "I have kept every card she sent. Twenty-two years. They are in a shoebox my husband calls the shrine. She remembers my mother's birthday. I forgot it once"); the occasion, staged (the parents' fiftieth, cited at other people's parties, as the introduction testified) — and the signature's mechanism, which the chapter must state as the act's first law: the romance, so famous, is service — the Suitor does not perform feeling; the Suitor performs attention, archived — every card a receipt of noticing — and the cost half, priced in full: the archive, so beautiful, runs one direction — the Suitor's own shoebox, searched, is empty — the closing line: the makeup who writes everyone's letters has no one to keep its own.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io