SAMPLE

The Twinned Soul

The Personality That Holds Order and Chaos in One Self

Aiman Sterling

Free sample: Introduction & Chapter 1

putrabooks.github.io

Buy the full book:

Carousell

Ko-fi

Contents

Introduction

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Twinned Soul at a Glance

Chapter 2: The Core — The Poles Hosted in One Body

Chapter 3: The Instrument — The Switch

Chapter 4: The Craft — The Two Citizens

Chapter 5: The Cost: The Ledger of the Two Half-Lives

Chapter 6: The Dark Side: The Ceasefire

Chapter 7: The Twinned Soul at Work — Career, Teams, and the Boss Relationship

Chapter 8: The Twinned Soul in Love and Friendship

Chapter 9: The Matchups — Companions, Rivals, and the Other Types

Chapter 10: From Ceasefire to Climate — the Twin Convening the Pair

Afterword

This free sample contains the Introduction and Chapter 1. The complete book contains the full contents above.

Introduction

You know this person, or you are this person. The record starts onto its most divided exhibit: the two selves the world has never managed to introduce — the weekday self, immaculate: the spreadsheets, the pressed shirts, the fourteen-point lists, the colleague's sentence, the most organized person in the building — and the weekend self, fluent in the storm: the 2 a.m. plans made and kept, the road trip with no destination, the dance floor, the friend's sentence, the freest spirit I know — and the file's found line, spoken by a person who has met both, with wonder and one raised eyebrow: I showed the Saturday one a photo of the Monday one, and she laughed and said: that is also me; nobody believed her, including her.

The couple living the split climate — the daylight partner and the midnight partner in one body, the evening's switch arriving as reliably as sunset — and the spouse's entry, held with love and whiplash: I have been married to the same person for twenty years, and I have never once met the whole of them at dinner. And the childhood the case notes cannot close: the house of two weathers — the weekday world of rules, quiet, and consequences, and the weekend world of noise, warmth, and improvisation — and the child who did the only arithmetic a child in two kingdoms can do: refused to choose, and became both — the day-self built to survive the ordered home, the night-self built to survive the wild one — and the discovery, total and permanent: the poles can be hosted in one body — order and chaos taking shifts — and the case notes set' founding finding set down in the ink the whole book lives in: the preschool self solved the war by never once being both in the same room; and the adult has been running the same treaty ever since: two selves, a ceasefire, and a border crossing at every change of light.

This is a case file on the Twinned Soul: the personality that holds order and chaos in one self.

The founding scene is the house of two weathers, and the filing marks what makes it the yearbook's most honest origin: the child in the double kingdom — the ordered home and the wild one, two worlds demanding two children, and both real: the rules were real, and so was the warmth on the other side of them — and the child, watchful and adaptable, discovered the truth that would run the whole life: each world punishes the other's child — the ordered home had no patience for wildness; the wild world had no patience for order — and the child's ruling, made before the age of reason and never so much as once reviewed: I will be the child this room wants — and the switching, the record's central correction, was not dishonesty: it was diplomacy — the child's embassy between two nations at war, run so long that the embassy became the self.

The engine this builds is the poles hosted in one body: order and chaos taking shifts, the type fluent in each and at home in neither — and the child, quite rationally, staying: the switching worked — both kingdoms admitted the child, both weathers paid the child in belonging — and the adult inherits the treaty's terms: the day-self and the night-self, the office and the party, the list and the impulse — each self complete, competent, and unknowing of the other — and the flaw is built into the same treaty, because a self run in shifts, the record's central finding, cannot hold either pole as itself: the day-self, when the weekend self burns the schedule, is quietly right (the chaos costs; the mail goes unopened; the Monday arrives with interest); the night-self, when the day self polices the calendar, is quietly right too (the order chokes; the joy, deferred, stops waiting) — and both selves are therefore untrusted — by the world, which cannot rely on either constancy, and by the self, which has watched each pole cancel the other for thirty years and concluded, in the file's most quietly exhausting finding, that there is no whole person in there at all: only a ceasefire, renewed at every change of light.

And the growth: the marriage of opposites — and the case filing is precise, because this is the widening the type will experience as impossible: not the choosing of one pole — the record defends both weathers to the last page: the order is real and the chaos is real, and a self that held only either would be half the self the type already is — but the introduction: the two selves, who have never once met, at last in the same room — the night-self invited to the weekday; the day-self invited to the party; the two weathers negotiated into one climate: order with the night in it, chaos with the calendar's respect — and the discovery, drawn from the genus's own founding scene: the child built two selves because the two kingdoms were at war — and the adult's whole work is the unearthing that the kingdoms negotiated: the border was never geography; it was a child's guess about the world — and the climate, once tested, holds: the record's mature files all contain the same stunned sentence, in the same hour: I did not know I was allowed to be both at once.

If you are this genus, the book's wager is exact: you are the most versatile self in every room you enter, and the case notes holds the proof — the two kingdoms both claimed you, both weathers paid you, the office and the party both call you theirs — and the filing's question, kept waiting through ten chapters and put to you here so you can face standing in it: who are you when the light is neither? — because the case notes set' answer, in every case, is the pronouncement the treaty guards most closely: a person who does not know — the self, at the border, between shifts, in the ordinary Tuesday dusk, cannot say what it is without consulting the room first — and the case notes' plainest line on the case: the Twinned Soul is the only type in this catalog that has never once been asked what it is without a context to answer for it.

If you love one, your direction is precise and counterintuitive: do not pick a favorite — the type has spent a lifetime being loved conditionally, one self at a time, by people who preferred one pole and said so; the instruction that works, and the case notes set have tested it: meet them both, and say so — the Saturday self greeted by name at the Monday office; the Monday self handed the aux cord on the road trip — until the day, the mature files all contain it, the Twinned Soul arrives at the dinner with both selves present, and says the sentence the treaty has held for thirty years, at the size it actually is, to a table that does not fall: these are both me; there was never a war; and I am done crossing the border twice a day.

Turn the page. The Twin is still out there — mid-shift, mid-crossing, two selves passing each other at the light change, unacquainted — and the file's promise is the case notes' plainest: the two weathers were always yours; the war was always the kingdoms', not yours; and the self, once the halves are introduced, becomes what it always looked like from neither side and never was: not two children in one body — one whole soul with two weathers in it, both kept honestly, in the same room, at the same time, at last.

And the record opens on the audit the file could only run with the subjects' own closets, held back until now because it reads as gossip until it is held beside the case notes: the wardrobe audit — the Twinned Souls of this dossier, so famously one body, keep two wardrobes, and the audit, run across the files, is the volume's true first exhibit: the clothing, zoned (the weekday half, pressed, gray, adjacent to the desk; the weekend half, louder, kept — the record verified this — in a different room: the flat's flattest finding, verbatim, from a subject's own tour: "'that's the work stuff.

The fun stuff's in the front closet. They don't hang together. That would be weird" — the they, the file notes, doing no work the subject noticed); the accessories, specialized (two watches, two wallets, two keys to the same flat); the overlap, zero — and the audit's yield, priced in full: the seam, so invisible in the day's testimony, is hanging in the closets — the type's one body lives in two uniforms, and neither garment has ever once been worn across the border — the reader is asked to carry the two closets through everything that follows: the dossier is not the study of a versatile person — it is the study of two citizens, one body, and a border enforced down to the coat hangers — and the whole file will show what the empty overlap already states: the two selves have never once shared so much as a scarf.

A note on the gathering of this testimony, because the file had to be twice-taken: the Twinned Soul's two worlds each reported a different person, and the record's protocol, after the first confused drafts, split the interviews down the seam — the weekday witnesses, interviewed at the office, describing the pressed, punctual, fourteen-point colleague; the weekend witnesses, interviewed at midnight, describing the storm-fluent, destination-less other — and the two transcript sets, laid side by side, disagreed on nearly everything except the name — and the file's method note, stitched where the two halves meet: the disagreement is not unreliable testimony; it is the finding — both accounts are true, and the record's only honest move was to give each pole its own stenographer — and the volume's one confession, logged by the interviewer who sat the one session where both worlds were present (a wedding, the office table and the midnight crowd in one room): the subject, caught mid-switch in the doorway, greeted the office table in daylight grammar, turned on one heel, and finished the sentence in the other weather — and the room, both halves watching, laughed — and the record entered the laugh as this dossier's only first-hand sighting of the seam: the two selves, at last, in one sentence, co-signing.

Chapter 1: The Signature — the Twinned Soul at a Glance

Before anyone speaks, the room has been consulted — and the case filing must open with the honest fact that makes this genus so capable and so unmet: the Twinned Soul is fluent. Radically, immediately fluent: the office self arriving pre-pressed and pre-listed; the party self arriving pre- warmed and pre-loose; the register, the vocabulary, the whole temperature of the person matched to the room within minutes, without effort, without appearing to try — and the record's sharp note: the fluency arrives with a border: the switch that arrives with the light or the dark — Friday at six, Sunday at nine, the office door, the phone call from the old friends — and the person on the far side of each border is the same face wearing a different climate — and the case notes set' founding entry beside it: the Twinned Soul is the only type in this catalog that the world has met twice and introduced zero times.

The manner carries the switch, and the filing must render it exactly, because it is so often mistaken for two-facedness: the Twin's shifting is not deceit; it is citizenship — the type is not lying to either room; the type is fully true in both: the Monday self genuinely loves the list; the Saturday self genuinely loves the noise; neither is a mask over the other — and the record's testimony, gathered from the colleagues and the friends when shown each other's version, is word for word the same in both directions: I cannot picture it; that is not the person I know — and the file's sharp note: both are right; the person they know is real; the person they know is half.

Sharper under observation: watch what happens to the type in a mixed room — the office party, the wedding where the worlds collide, the colleague invited to the birthday — the record's finest finding: the Twinned Soul at a mixed event is the least fluent person there: neither self can be worn whole without betraying the other half of the guest list, and the type hovers at the border, warm-but-not-too-warm, organized-but-not-rigid, performing, for the only hour of the year, a third self nobody knows — and the file's dry line: the mixed room is the Twin's tell; the fluency has a seam, and the seam shows exactly where the two worlds can see each other.

And underneath the switching runs the tell the genus's loved ones all report and this genus never sees: the consult — the self consulted before it exists: the plans made by checking which world they will happen in; the opinions issued by checking which room is asking; the answer to what do you want? routed, in every case, through the room's weather first — and the case filing's correction: this genus does not experience this as emptiness; the type experiences it as politeness — but the case notes, which has watched the constant for thirty case-years, enters its plain finding: the Twinned Soul has never once answered the question who are you? without first answering, silently, who is asking?

The file holds two versions of the origin, both of them true, and they converge on the same border.

In the first version, the kingdom was the house — two weathers under one roof: the weekday parent and the weekend parent; the ordered rooms and the loud ones; the school-year world of rules, consequences, and pressed quiet, and the holiday world of noise, warmth, and improvisation — and the child, spending real hours in both, learned each world's language as a first language: fluent in order, fluent in chaos, and the unearthing, made before the age of reason: each world punishes the other's child — the wild child is in trouble in the ordered rooms; the ordered child is invisible in the wild ones — and the child's ruling: I will be the child this room wants.

In the second version, the kingdoms were separate houses — the school- week home and the weekend home; the two households of a divided family, or the grandmother's discipline and the father's improvisation — and the switching was logistics: the bag packed Sunday night for the crossing; the two selves unpacked, one in each jurisdiction, the border run like clockwork for a decade of childhoods — and the child discovered the powerhouse's second law, the one that would run the whole life: the crossing works — both kingdoms received the child, both claimed the child, both paid the child in belonging — and the treaty, the record notes, was never signed by anyone but the child, and amended never.

And the origin moment, where the versions converge, is always a punished crossing — and always the same scene each time without exception: the child arriving in the wrong climate — the wildness brought into the ordered room; the order brought into the wild one — and the weather, real and immediate: the correction, the mockery, the withdrawal of belonging — and the preschool self's ruling, made in the one second the whole biography turns on: never again; the selves will not mix; the border holds — and the fabric signed that night: I am the child of whichever room I am in; I hold both; I show each room one; and the case notes set must enter the last clause with the care this case deserves — and the two will never be seen together, because the two, seen together, ended the belonging last time.

The record's correction follows the signature like a border follows a war: the switching saved the child — genuinely, verifiably, in both kingdoms — and the adult has spent thirty years defending a border drawn by a six-year-old against a world that, the mature files all confirm, stopped punishing crossings decades ago.

The album opens as this album always opens, and this case's is the yearbook's most double: in every year there are two photographs, and they do not look like the same child's life. The school photographs: pressed, alert, the face already doing the weekday — the handwriting neat, the teacher's note, the case notes have collected it from every case: a pleasure in class. And beside them, always, the other set: the birthday parties, the lake summers, the weekend frames — the same face, lit differently — the hair down, the laugh mid-shout, the record's note on the second set: no teacher ever saw this child.

The family tables, year upon year — and the indicatoring detail the filing marks at once: the child is present and correct in both weathers — the weekday table's quiet helper, the weekend table's chaos engine — and in not one photograph in not one case is the child caught between: the album's record of the split childhood is a record of two complete citizens, and no ambassador.

The album's most telling photograph is the one nobody wants: the border crossing — the Sunday-night bag packed on the bed, the child sitting beside it, face neutral, loading — the record's sharp entry beside it: the crossing hour was the childhood's real weather — the hour when neither self was on duty, and the child, briefly, was no one's — and the album's quietest line: the face in that photograph is the only unperformed face in the album, and nobody, including the child, knew what to do with it.

And the album ends on the closer the series knows is coming: the preschool self already the adult — the adolescence organized around the crossing: the weekday self's transcripts immaculate; the weekend self's reputation already legendary; the two sets of friends who never met, kept apart with the diplomacy of a small state — and the case notes set' count of the album's final year: two proms attended as two people, zero people at either who knew both — and the moment the treaty became the self, the switching installed as identity, the border crossed so long it stopped being a border and became the person.

The child looks into the camera of the leaving-home photograph and says, without words, the whole constitution: I contain two citizens; I show each room one; and I have never once been both — and the album, gently, disagrees: the preschool self was always both; the child was only ever allowed one at a time — which is the case as a totality, and the whole file: two weathers, one border, and a self that has never once seen its own whole sky.

Energy: two-nation — the type runs on whichever grid is live: the weekday's steady current, the weekend's alternating surge — and the file's honest spec: the type has never so much as once run out of energy for the room it is in, and never once had any left for the crossing between.

Ambition: dual citizenship — the type wants both kingdoms' good opinion, and gets both, and the record's dry note: the ambition was never to conquer either world; it was to be claimed by both, at once, without paying the crossing toll.

Vanity structure: the fluency — the pride is in being unfishable: the room never guesses the other self exists; each world believes it has the whole person, and the type, the file notes, has never once corrected either world, because the correction was the thing the childhood punished most.

Loyalty: total in each nation, and unshared — the weekday friends and the weekend friends, the office family and the party family, both loved genuinely, neither introduced — the record's driest note: the Twin's loyalty has never once been tested by the only test that matters — both rooms at one table.

Weakness: the border — the self consulted before it exists; the answer routed through the room's weather; the mixed-event seam; the whiplash identity, both selves untrusted because neither is constant.

Unspoken need: to be both in front of someone — the two weathers witnessed at one table; the self greeted whole; the need the treaty guards like a national secret, because the last time the selves were seen together, the belonging ended.

At a party. The Saturday self, fully — the fluency, the warmth, the 2 a.m. plans made and kept — and the file's sharp detail: the Twinned Soul is the party's best guest and the record's most anonymous: the whole room claims the type, and not one guest could say what the type does on a Monday — and the tell is at the door: the phone checked at the threshold, the weekday's messages answered in the stairwell — the border, run at every entry, because the kingdoms, the type's whole life long, have never once been allowed to call each other.

In a new job. Instantly promising — the weekday self is impeccable: the lists, the deadlines, the register matched to the office within the week — and the case notes' warning arrives on schedule: the workplace will meet exactly one of the type's two citizens, and bill the type for a whole person's constancy: the office's version of the Twin is reliable, organized, and — the file's finding, uniform in every case — quietly starving: the day- self, run without the night, hardens into armor: the type, at work, is the most organized person in the building, and the record has never once seen that person laugh.

Under sudden pressure. The type's finest hour, and the case filing enters it with genuine awe: the crisis is the one weather where both selves work — the Twinned Soul in a real emergency is the record's most complete performer: the night-self's improvisation inside the day-self's triage; the order and the chaos, for the emergency's whole duration, in the same hands — and the filing's most delicate finding: this genus, in every case, loves crises — not for the drama; for the unity: the crisis is the only room the child ever found where the two citizens were allowed to work together — and the record's line: the mature files, reread, show the pattern plainly: the type's favorite hours are the ones the world calls disasters.

In a boring meeting. Present, level — and the record's x-ray: the civil service of the night — the day-self running the agenda while the night-self, unseen, does the type's real interior work: the plan for Saturday, the joke banked for the party, the wild idea filed at the desk — and the case filing's tender note: the meeting's minutes record this genus's order, and the twin, under the order, is crossing letters — the two selves, at work, passing notes under the border like schoolchildren, and never once showing each other's faces.

On holiday. The full conversion — the record's happiest and saddest finding for this case: the Twinned Soul on holiday is the weekend self, whole: the schedule dissolved, the road trip with no destination, the joy at full volume — and the tell is in the re-entry: the last evening of every holiday in the file is spent, in every case, gearing for the crossing: the lists rebuilt, the armor laid out, the Sunday-night bag packed with the childhood's exact diplomacy — and the case notes set' line on the pattern: the holiday does not unite the type; it visits the other nation, and comes home — and the border, the whole file has found, is packed and carried everywhere.

The Conflicted Maiden (Volume 66) is the nearest neighbor, and the confusion is the filing's most consequential, because both types carry two halves and both types' growth is called integration — but the halves are built of different material: the Maiden's two selves are inner — duty and desire, the anchor and the impulse, arguing inside one room, in one life, in one hour — the split is a civil war: the Maiden cannot go to the party without the home half objecting, cannot stay home without the party half starving; the conflict is simultaneous, and the suffering is the simultaneity.

The Twinned Soul's two selves are contextual — day and night, office and weekend, taking shifts: the split is a border: the Twin at the office is not at war with the Twin at the party; the two have never once been in the same room. The test: ask each of them, on a Tuesday afternoon, what do you want? The Maiden will answer with a fight — two voices, one mouth, the tug visible on the face; the Twinned Soul will answer with a consult — the room checked, the weather matched, the answer issued as the day-self, whole and calm and not entirely the self's own.

The border, dry and final: the Maiden cannot choose between her halves; the Twin has never once had to — and only one of them is suffering from the war; the other is suffering from the peace — which is the whole difference, and the case filing as a totality, and the reason the Maiden's integration chapter is this book's ending, arriving as news.

The Radiant Performer (Volume 11) is the misdiagnosis the world makes kindly: the Performer's selves are staged — the roles played, knowingly, for the room, the masks held by a self who knows it is wearing them, the audience the point, the multiplicity a craft; the Twinned Soul's selves are lived — the two citizens are not performances; they are residencies: the type does not know, while wearing the Monday self, that the Saturday self exists in any way that counts; each self is sincere, each is whole, and neither is a mask — the Performer has many faces and one backstage; the Twin has two backstages and no stage manager.

The test: catch each of them off duty, alone, between rooms. The Performer, caught backstage, is one person: tired, amused, running lines; the Twin, caught at the crossing, is — the record has watched — no one: the neutral face at the bag, the self-loading hour, the person between weathers who cannot say what it wants without consulting a room that is not there. The border: the Performer plays many; the Twin is two — and only one of them can be summoned whole at will, which is the Performer's gift, and the Twin's entire missing chapter.

The Gentle Storm (Volume 71) is the sibling the two files keep confusing, and the confusion is understandable, because both cases are built of two weathers — but the Storm's two weathers are stacked: the calm on top, the storm beneath, vertical — the stillness a lid, the eruption a leak, and the two weathers never both shown, because the whole constitution is the lid; the Twinned Soul's two weathers are side by side: the order in one room, the chaos in the next, horizontal — no lid anywhere, nothing stored, both selves shown, fully, in their separate jurisdictions — the Storm's case was about storage; the Twin's is about scheduling.

The test: put each of them in the wrong room. The Storm, forced to party, is still calm — the lid holds; the storm goes home unspent, into storage. The Twin, forced to party, is the party — the room summons the self, the switch runs, and the weekday is simply not in evidence, because it was never stored anywhere; it is at the office, whole, waiting for Monday. The border, the chapter's last and the case's quietest: the Storm hides its second weather; the Twin schedules it — and the file's closing note, which the book as a totality will build on: the Storm's growth was the valve (the weather let out); the Twin's is the introduction (the weathers let meet) — two different operations, for two different architectures, and the file has watched the self-help world prescribe the first to the second for thirty years: the Twin does not need to vent; the Twin needs a dinner party where both selves are invited.

The signature the two witness-sets agreed on without knowing they were agreeing, opened first because it locates the only shared territory in this geography: the seams — the exact hours where the two selves hand over — and the record's seam-map, compiled from both transcript sets, is the chapter's exhibit: the Saturday noon line, crossed with groceries in hand (the weekend self, arriving in the Monday self's shopping list, but with the Monday self's budget abandoned at the door); the Sunday dusk line, crossed in the wrong direction by the day-self, who arrives early and irritable to claim the workweek's first hour while the weekend self is still being waved off by the guests — and the seam's one rule, uniform across every file: the two selves never meet at the seam — the handover is conducted like a border crossing: keys, phone, wallet, and a running monologue about the other self in the second person (you left the dishes; tell him I covered for him) — the file's finding at the seam: the split is not a performance with an audience of one — the two selves are neighbors who share an address and leave notes, and the seam, so punctual, is the closest thing this type has to a meeting.

One further signature, logged by every witness who has ever tried to make a plan with this type, because it is the split's most practical face: the weather report — the Twinned Soul cannot confirm any invitation for a self that is not present — and the record's evidence, gathered from both address books: the Saturday question, asked on Monday (will you be at the lake next weekend?), answered in the day-self's grammar: "that is not really up to me" — to a colleague, about the subject's own calendar — and the night crowd's mirror complaint: the Tuesday question, asked at midnight, answered with the day-self's alibi (I have someone staying over who will say no) — and the report's finding, which the chapter enters as the type's only honest metaphor about itself: the subject, asked directly by the record which self would be at a given appointment, gave the file its closing line: "whichever one wakes up there" — the weather, so unpredictable, being the point: this type cannot promise the other tenant anything, and the whole address book, both halves of it, has learned to book the climate and let the self sort itself out at the door.

End of free sample. The full book is available at putrabooks.github.io

Read the rest

THE TWINNED SOUL

The full book continues past this sample.

Get it here:
https://ko-fi.com/s/144cb13c96

Pay what you want, S$1.90 or more. No account needed. Instant PDF + EPUB.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Aiman Sterling is the author of The Archetype Series -- a library of personality portraits drawn the way literature draws characters: the great types of human temperament, recognized at a glance, understood in depth, and followed from childhood wound to mature strength.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Aiman Sterling is the author of The Archetype Series -- a library of personality portraits drawn the way literature draws characters: the great types of human temperament, recognized at a glance, understood in depth, and followed from childhood wound to mature strength.